Mr. Fraser: This set of amendments omits the spec provisions which are made for the City of London in t
Bill. I am not sure why they are there. I understand th the City of London does not receive any block grant. It affluent enough to look after itself, as well as other pa of London.

Although it may not be of any practical importance the City of London, the amendments raise matters principle that we should explore. They relate to t different views that the Government take about pub expenditure. For instance, if a firm spends £25 milli upon the professional fees involving a takeover, it is n a matter of concern for the Government because that private expenditure, with which they do not interfe

However, if a smaller amount of money is spent by a local authority on the provision of blankets or heating for the poor during the inclement weather they do need to interfere. In the same way, the Government are unconcerned that people come and go at salaries which were reported in the paper this morning of between £200,000 and £300,000 per annum. That is of no consequence to the Government because that is private expenditure, but the Government sit heavily on local authorities that employ people to look after those who are poor, deprived and need the assistance of their local authority. That difference of opinion between public and private expenditure illustrates and underlines the difference between the Opposition and the Government.

However, there is an even more bizarre example of that difference of opinion in clause 1. The Government are saying that if any local authority, apart from the City of London, uses special funds the expenditure that is saved by the income from those special funds going into the general rate account should be left out of the account altogether, but that that should not apply to the City of London.

I understand the reason that lies behind that. The City of London is enormously rich because it has accumulated funds over hundreds of years for various special purposes. Once a year, the City of London is good enough to invite Members of Parliament to discuss the way that the City of London is run as a local government unit. The City of London explains to us—I make no complaint about this — that the City's great celebrations and displays of pomp and circumstance do not cost the taxpayer or the ratepayer a penny because of the accumulated funds. The City of London must have approached the Government and asked that their special funds be treated differently from those of any other local authority. The Minister will not disagree that the result of the Bill is that the City of London is treated differently from any other local authority.

How does that work in practice? It means that if the City of London uses special funds—as I believe it does — to have a banquet at the Mansion house or to entertain the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Prime Minister, a foreign statesman, or a foreign dictator at the Guildhall, as it does by tradition, and if it serves the traditional boeuf en croute or smoked salmon mousse, those matters are not of concern to the Government or matters that should be restrained by any local government legislation, and the City of London should be able to continue with that kind of expenditure untrammelled.

However, if a local authority does not want to provide banquets for foreign statesmen — least of all for the Chancellor of the Exchequer — but does, as its main priority, want to provide a meals on wheels service for the indigent people of its borough, the Government take a different attitude and say that any kind of device that a local authority employs, or any kind of creativity within its accounts, is to be dealt with by the draconian provisions of the Bill.

In the City of London there is a hands-off attitude to expenditure on boeuf en croute or smoked salmon mousse, but meals on wheels for the poor is a different matter. I have heard criticism of the use of race relations advice in Lambeth over the meals-on-wheels service to ensure that moslem constituents are not offended by being sent roast pork in their meals on wheels. That is just as ridiculous an expenditure as providing a seven-course meal for Dr. Hastings Banda.

Let us have another example. The City of London has a bridge fund. The Government do not want to interfere in the expenditure of that bridge fund. Its purpose is to replace London bridge. That expenditure on the rates has, I think, led the City of London to have an expenditure above its target and GREA. It is always top of the league — my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) says 300 per cent. — in overspending. The Government want to ignore that. But once the bridge is built and people are sleeping beneath the arches of the bridge in winter, if Southwark, on the south side of the river, wants to assist with blankets those people beneath the bridge which was built with City funds, its expenditure will be penalised under the rating system, yet it is only caring for the poor and disadvantaged of the borough.

Another example is expenditure on the Barbican. I enjoy going to the Barbican, when I can find it. I enjoy its theatre and music. I understand that much of that is also provided by special City funds. I make no complaint about the City's contribution to Britain's arts. It subsidises the Royal Shakespeare theatre and Shakespeare said that music soothes the savage breast. But there are a good many savage breasts in other parts of Britain—people who are unemployed, people who have suffered grave discrimination and people who have little chance of getting on in life. Some local authorities want to provide art at a different level for such people. They want to provide music, instruments and tuition for such people. That is lumped on to their general expenditure and can incur the penalties which are visited upon people by the rate support grant system, and that is to be treated entirely differently. One could go on.

My complaint is not about the City of London's expenditure—some of us may be a little envious of its funds—but that the Government do not judge according to need but according to affluence. They say that because the City of London has accumulated moneys, whatever the nature of its expenditure, no matter how flamboyant or extravagant it might appear to the outside world, it is not to be constrained or dealt with in any way at all under Government legislation relating to local government finance. But if, on the other hand, a borough is less affluent than the City of London, if a local government district has great deprivation, poverty and need within its boundaries but it is not an affluent borough, the Government say that borough should be dealt with in an entirely different way.

Therefore, I move the amendment not in any sense of envy or complaint about the City of London's expenditure under these circumstances, but to underline what we regard as a discriminatory attitude between one local authority and another. It is to underline that point of principle that I move the amendment today.

Mr. Tony Banks: I support amendments Nos. 22 to 26 in respect of the City of London.

The City of London already enjoys too many privileges and rights which are not extended to other authorities. I do not see why the City should be treated as an exception yet again in this legislation. I assume that the reasons are as stated by my hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser)—that the City has special cash funds and resources that place it in a different position from other local authorities and the Bill therefore seeks to allow the City to continue to enjoy those additional and unique funds and does not want to tax them. That is wrong.

If the City wants to remain part of Britain's local government structure, it must suffer the same problems and burdens as the rest of local government in terms of interference by the Government. The City should share the misery that all other local authorities now have to suffer as a result of Government legislation.

I have a great deal of respect for the City of London as an institution. I do not want my remarks to be misunderstood or misinterpreted. While I was chairman of the Greater London council I enjoyed a great deal of the hospitality of the City corporation, particularly the Lord Mayor and the sheriffs. It was an amiable period. One tried to reciprocate as best one could, but one could never hope to emulate the City's hospitality. Indeed, no local authority would even attempt to do so because it would be rightly castigated by its ratepayers and the press for a great waste of money. However, it is difficult when one receives the hospitality of the City to know how to respond. One perhaps should not respond by continually attacking it, but when I do, I do so as someone who believes that the City of London has no place within the democratic structure of London's local government and, indeed, local government nationally, although it has a role and a history that one must respect.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Is it not the case that when a Labour-controlled local authority provides hospitality it is vilified by the media for wasting ratepayers' money, and when a radical Labour local authority gets rid of such things it is attacked for destroying the customs and traditions of the area?

Mr. Banks: What my hon. Friend is adequately demonstrating is that Labour local authorities cannot win. Whatever they do, they will be attacked and vilified by the press, egged on by the Conservative party. We understand the point. That is what offends. In many cases the press and the Conservative party are one and the same thing. However, it still offends what little sense of natural justice a Member of Parliament can maintain after three years in this place.

Effectively, the City of London exists today as an unreformed ancient municipality. It was granted privileges by King John in 1215 and until 1948 it returned its own Member of Parliament. To demonstrate the way in which it is treated as an exception in London—the Bill wants to continue to treat it as an exception—the City retains its own police force. It has its Lord Mayor and a bench of aldermen. Aldermen were abolished elsewhere in local government some years ago, I think by the legislation of 1972. That would not be so bad, but it goes much further than that. Those aldermen—there is a bench of 25—are elected for life. How can the City postulate in any credible fashion that it is a democratic structure when it still has aldermen in it who are elected for life.

It is from the aldermanic bench that the Lord Mayor is elected. Until quite recently, that bench made sure that no women were elected. Although Edwina Coven—a name remarkably like that of a Conservative Member—won elections she could not take her seat because the sexist rules of the City prevented her from doing so. That now passed, but it took until recent years for particular rule to be broken down.

I am seeking to demonstrate that the City is continu treated differently from every other local authority terms of its structure, practices and procedures and its financial accounting. I really cannot see that this defensible position within the context of Governm policy towards local government generally or in term the specific requirements of the Bill.

The matter has best been summed up by the Her commission which sat between 1957 and 1960 and stu the structure of London local government. Indeed, it the Herbert report which was used as the basis of London Government Act 1963 which set up the G These words will keep coming back because they amazing. When the Herbert commission looked at structure of London local government it said:

"If we were to be strictly logical we should recommend amalgamation of the City and Westminster. But logic ha limits and the City lies outside them."

That was a Royal Commission saying, in effect, that City was too powerful and was served by too many ve interests.

That is an amazing statement on the way in which City has always resisted the logical restructuring of l government and any changes in the way in which electoral processes of local government are administe

When we refer to the City of London many foreig and people from outside London assume that we mean the greater London area. So that hon. Members are c about it, I must say that it relates only to the square m

In the 19th century a number of Prime Minis especially Gladstone, tried to get the City of Londo assume responsibility for the whole of the wider Lon area, but it steadfastly refused to do that. I realise respect the fact that many Londoners like the C traditions, especially the Lord Mayor's show. Theref it would be unwise of a Labour Government to conf the City head on and say, "Let us abolish the Cit London." After all, we have just fought many battles abolition. That word does not commend itself to La Members in respect of local government, and it will commend itself to us when we are in power.

We must ensure that we are consistent. We have that we shall look at local government structures an objective in our assessment. When we are in governm we must not abolish the City but incorporate it so tha Court of Common Council could become in effect equivalent of the Greater London council. Each mem on it could stand as an elected member for each of London parliamentary constituencies. They would the be democratically elected for a four-year term. The b of aldermen in the City of London would be abolis along with a number of other practices.

The Court of Common Council would be made u the elected representatives from the 92 Lon constituencies who would elect the Mayor. We w retain the Lord Mayor's show, but he would be the Mayor of Greater London and could speak as the nu one citizen of Greater London. That would ultima fulfill the historic role that Gladstone offered the Ci the 19th century.

I remind hon. Members that, although at presen City only covers one square mile, it is the richest of al local authorities in London. It contributes a ma amount to the other London boroughs and to the equalisation system. We accept that fact. The City of London has benefited disproportionately from the abolition of the Greater London council, especially where new schemes have been set up which are based on a contribution on a per capita basis because it has a farcically low number of electors. The most recent register of electors that I have comprises an electorate of 4,811. There is massive wealth in the hands effectively of an electorate of 4,811.

The City of London's ward lists record an electorate of 14,189 for the 25 wards, of which 4,760 are resident voters and 9,439 non-residents. Those lists are used when electing aldermen and members of the Common Council. The resident electorate is small. Therefore, its demands on the City's services in terms of social services, education or housing are, indeed, minute, hence the fact that the City must contribute so much to the other parts of London. We must bear in mind the fact that the City of London is surrounded by some of the poorest boroughs in London, such as Tower Hamlets and Hackney, to name but two. Hackney is the most deprived local authority area in the whole of England and Tower Hamlets comes third.

Mr. Gerrard Neale (Cornwall, North): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, to a large extent, those councils have been the victims of their own problems in that they have been most obstructive to any attempts made to try to improve the rateable values of those areas? The Government have brought forward such areas as the docklands and helped many of the London boroughs to obtain better rateable value in the future.

Mr. Banks: The hon. Gentleman's point leads on to a whole area of argument on the impact on the east end of the docklands area and, especially, its impact on Tower Hamlets. I am delighted to enter that argument if I can stay within order. Whatever additional benefit may come to Tower Hamlets or to Newham through activity by the London Docklands development corporation area, the impact on property prices has been so dramatic as to remove that area from its residents. The traditional residents, the east enders, are effectively being forced out of the east end.

Mr. Allan Roberts: It is true that the Tower Hamlets council, which is now under Liberal control, but even previously when it was Labour controlled, adopted a policy of selling estates to the private sector and encouraged—some Labour Members thought wrongly—the City to move into Tower Hamlets. The council even kept the rates down to encourage that. Tower Hamlets is one of the lowest rated London boroughs. I, as a resident there, am aware of those matters. I do not necessarily agree with those policies, but the council did that, contrary to what the hon. Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale) said.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Paul Dean): I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not be tempted to stray from the Common Council, which is what the amendment is about.

Mr. Banks: Whenever an hon. Member gets involved in a discussion about the City of London such matters tend to arise. The City of London is a speck of enormous affluence in a great sea of poverty in the east end. It will cause a great deal of controversy as long as it continues to exist, in terms of its peculiar position in relation to local government democracy and the inordinate concentration of wealth that it has at its disposal. The City has for many years resisted attempts to reform it by powerful politicians in this place. They do not come much more powerful than W. E. Gladstone. The City even resisted his attempts to reform its structure and its system. The City can still draw enormous power from within the Conservative party.

I know that the City is proud of saying, "We are totally democratic. We have elections and, after all, we are non-party political." That is absolute nonsense. The City is the ultimate Tory authority. It has reached a point where the Conservative party so controls everything in the City that it can declare itself to be non-political. The City has effectively made it impossible for anyone other than someone of Conservative politics to gain control in the City.

Before Conservative Members jump up and remind me, I know that there are Labour party Members on the Court of Common Council. But no one who is honest enough to declare himself as a Labour party candidate can get elected. We are discussing the most undemocratic local government institution in the country bar none. The day of the City is fast approaching. A Labour Government will adopt a solution for the City, perhaps broadly along the lines that I described a little earlier.

6.30 pm

Mr. Meadowcroft: If the hon. Gentleman is relying on a future Labour Government, the City is fairly safe.

Mr. Banks: It was not worth giving way to the hon. Gentleman to allow him to make that intervention.

An interesting report was published by the London Labour party in 1974 following the setting up of a working party. It makes extremely interesting reading and the hon. Gentleman might care to exchange notes with his Social Democratic party colleague, the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), about some of the things that he was saying at that time about the City, with which I agreed entirely. I hope that he still holds those views, but I do not know what the alliance's policy is on the City of London. I hope that the hon. Member for Woolwich is as forthright today as he was in 1974.

There is no such thing as a free lunch, although this place would believe that it has found the source of all free lunches. Someone has to pay in the end. There is no such thing as a free lunch in the City. Although the City can say that the great civic events that it provides—for example, the Lord Mayor's show and many other services—are paid for out of City cash, the moneys came from somewhere. The moneys are the product of someone's efforts, or were filched from a group of industrious workers in the City of London or thereabouts. The moneys still belong to the public. They cannot be private moneys, and no local authority can say that it has access to private moneys. All local authority resources and finance are public money by definition.

Although the City of London may be able to pay for magnificant banquets at the Mansion house and the Guildhall out of City cash, it is still using public money. If the Government are opposing the amendments because of the existence of City cash, they are wrong to do so. I shall listen with great interest to what the Minister says about the amendments I am supporting.

Dr. Boyson: I was delighted two days ago to see that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) had in his possession a copy of the Sunday Telegraph.

Mr. Tony Banks: I still have it.

Dr. Boyson: A vintage copy. I would not agree necessarily with the line that the hon. Gentleman has advanced. Indeed, I am sure that he would be disappointed if I did. He has referred to the famous free market doctrine that there is no such thing as a free lunch. Day by day I see the improvement of the hon. Gentleman, who is a regular attender of our debates. Milton Friedman's book is on my shelf, and I am sure that by now it is on the hon. Gentleman's shelf. This shows what time in the House of Commons, or advanced age as we approach it, does to us all. The hon. Gentleman has dined at the Guildhall, and I did so last night. I did not realise yesterday that I would be replying to the debate that has taken place on the amendment. I am sure that huge sums would have been paid to enable individuals to hear the speech which I delivered last night. It would seem that I have shared City hospitality with the hon. Gentleman.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) about local authorities maintaining tradition or destroying it. I like tradition. I would never attack a local authority or any other authority for maintaining it. I never agreed — this shows how reactionary I must be — with the destruction of the alderman tradition. Many aldermen carried out useful functions and served in that capacity for a long time. Some authorities, thank goodness, retained aldermen.

I shall not take up all the remarks which have been made about the City. It should be remembered that it brings about £7·5 billion a year into the balance of payments. That is a sum that any Labour Government would be glad of, never mind a Conservative Government. Certainly, any Chancellor of the Exchequer would be glad to have it. About 1 million are employed in the financial services sector, it being the sector that has expanded the most.

It has been accepted that the Common Council of the City of London has a number of unusual funds for historic reasons. It does not act like a normal local authority and it has taken on responsibilities that go wider than those which local authorities normally assume. The purpose of subsections (7) and (8) is to ensure that the revenue expenditure and income do not have to be shown in the rate fund revenue account. If the expenditure and income were shown there, it would have to be taken into account in calculating the Common Council's relevant and total expenditure for rate support grant purposes although it receives no RSG. In existing legislation "relevant expenditure" is defined as all expenditure falling to be defrayed out of the rate fund, and the rate fund is defined in relation to the Common Council in section 54 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 as a general rate. Thus under existing legislation only expenditure and income that is defrayed out of the general rate is taken into account for relevant and total expenditure purposes. Subsections (7) and (8) of clause 1 preserve the present position and Opposition Members know that amendments Nos. 22 to 26 would change it. I ask my hon. Friends to resist the amendment and allow the position to be left as it is.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. John Fraser: I beg to move amendment No. 2
'in relation to future years' and add
'only in relation to the financial year 1977-78'.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this it wi
'the year beginning in 1988 and subsequent years'.

No. 57, in clause 3, page 3, line 18, leave out 'any f year' and insert
'the year beginning in 1988 and subsequent years'.

No. 76, in page 4, line 19, leave out 'any future and insert
'the year beginning in 1988 and subsequent years'.

No. 186, in schedule 4, page 15, line 39, leave out
'Schedule' to end of line 45 and insert
'shall have effect in relation to the financial year beginni
1988 and subsequent financial years'.

There is a misprint in amendment No. 27. The fina year should be 1987-88.

Mr. Fraser: I move amendment No. 27 for the pu of introducing a discussion on the amendments tha grouped with it. I realise that amendment No. 27 cor a misprint.

We are dealing with emergency legislation to deal
a situation which has come to the attention o
Secretary of State relatively recently, and he mus quickly before local authorities make decisions rating next year. Our initial reaction was to ap restriction to 1987-88 but not thereafter. When we ga matter further thought, we came to the conclusion th clause should be amended with a provision that s apply to 1988 and future years, and I shall te Committee why we took that view.

Clause 1 attempts to make considerable alterati the way in which the rate fund is calculated and th no disagreement across the Floor of the Chamber that. The Government wish to control the rate fund more diligently, including those items that are debited and those that are to be credited to the rat account. We shall debate this issue at greater length we come to the Birmingham case and other case between the Government, accountants, auditors an in local government on how matters should proceed. No doubt there is a measure of agreement about the changes that should be made to the calculation of accounts. If this amendment were passed, there would be about 12 months available to consult the various parties about the changes.

We are not proposing any different practice from that which would be followed if one proposed changing the format of company accounts, corporation tax or any similar fiscal measure. Why should local authorities be treated in this peremptory fashion when those in commerce and industry would be treated with much more consideration? There would also be more consultation with those parties than is proposed with local authorities.

I ask for this amendment to be carried so that there can be adequate consultation. Such consultation would mean that the Government could reach a decision about the proper way in which to conduct local government accounts.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I support the proposal to postpone the introduction of these rules for one financial year.

I sometimes wonder what knowledge Conservative Ministers have about local government processes. It is assumed that the proposed changes can be introduced rapidly. However, local government budgeting processes for the next financial year are well under way. That budgeting commenced in late autumn. The various spending departments have put forward their proposals and they have been considered by the finance and policy committees. The final decisions on budget will be reached shortly. Therefore, it is a devastating thing to suggest that the accounting basis on which a local authority prepares the future year's spending should be changed at this stage.

I hope that Ministers recognise that local government does not cover some small parish council but vast cities and huge counties with complex financial arrangements. It would be very difficult for local government to institute proper budgetary plans if it faced the prospect of the Government altering, in detail, its accounting processes. Any changes would abide in the next financial year. Therefore, it is perfectly logical and reasonable to suggest to the Government that, if they wish to carry the Bill in its present form, they should be sensitive to the needs of local government and avoid imposing new plans at short notice.

Dr. Boyson: The Bill is necessary because the total expenditure definition contained in the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 that we presumed meant one thing turned out to mean no such thing. That is why action had to be taken and quickly. That mistake had put at risk the whole settlement.

The 1980 Act was based upon the recommendations made by the local authority associations but I do not blame those associations. Certain advice came from ministerial advisers within the Department and from the local authorities, but the local authorities were mistaken about the definition.

The purpose of the Bill is to put back the definition exactly to what was presumably meant in 1980 and had been recommended by the associations. If there had not been any doubt about the definitions, this Bill would not be before the House and we would not have the pleasure of one another's company today and on Monday.

Amendment No.27 should refer to 1987-88; there is a misprint in its reference to 1977-78. The amendment would mean that, in the years after 1987-88, we would have no means of calculating relevant or total expenditure and the rate support grant system could not be operated for those years.

The House is aware that we have had to rush through this Bill so that we can validate the methods of distribution of rate support grant to enable local authorities to receive the money from the 1 April without a challenge being put down that could stand in the courts against the basis of that distribution.

Opposition Members who have been present for the debate will be aware that my—right hon. Friends and I have no love for the present system of local government finance — [Interruption.] We are proposing a Green Paper on the subject. Therefore, will we have the support of the Opposition?

Mr. Straw: Ministers are now saying that they have no love for the present system, as if that system had nothing to do with them. I am glad they have no love for it because it is a mess, but will Ministers have the humility to recognise that they set it up?

Dr. Boyson: Lucky is the man who has never made a mistake in his life. There have been clashes within the Labour party when some consider it has made a wrong decision.

There is a general feeling within the Conservative party that the present system of local government finance is unsatisfactory. That is why we have suggested the move to the community charge, which has met with Labour party opposition, and the centralisation of the business rate. Both suggestions are in the Green Paper. We already have a Bill going through regarding finance in Scotland and a commitment that we shall introduce a similar Bill affecting the English and Welsh rate support grant and how it is distributed. That Bill will be introduced in the near future.

Mr. John Fraser: Next week?

Dr. Boyson: No, not next week but it will be introduced, at the latest, in the first Session of the next Parliament.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Will the Minister undertake that the Government will not abolish rates in Scotland and then seek to introduce the poll tax after the general election? Will they have the full system working before the general election so that people can decide at the ballot box whether they prefer what has been introduced or what the Government have abolished?

Dr. Boyson: If the hon. Gentleman is suggesting—it is an interesting proposition—that we delay the general election for five years to enable us to vote on the working of the poll tax he may well have my support.

Mr. Allan Roberts: The Bill before Parliament will, in theory, abolish the rating system in Scotland and it should be passed before the general election. However, if the general election is called within a certain length of time after the Bill has been passed, the rating system will be abolished but no one will yet have been required to pay the poll tax or community charge. Will the Government delay the general election or speed up the introduction of the payment of the poll tax to apply a true test of which method the electorate prefer?

Dr. Boysen: Given a choice, I would choose to delay the election. That is much more attractive.

Mr. Fraser: I believe that the Minister misunderstood my question. I wanted to know whether we would have another local government finance Bill next week on grant recycling and whether it will run in tandem with this Bill.

Dr. Boyson: I am aware that there is another Bill coming forward. We shall all meet again, of that I am certain, in the House and in Committee upstairs. We can look forward to the same cast and we shall have many performances—not necessarily as many as the Windmill. I cannot pre-empt the Leader of the House or the usual channels to say when that Bill will come forward. I know that there is great zeal on the Labour Benches for that Bill to be introduced, but I must not be distracted any more by interventions from Labour Members.

It is impossible for the systems that we prefer—centralised business rate and community charge—to be brought in before the next general election. That is why we have to introduce this measure, which will validate existing practice. That is what we are doing throughout. Amendments Nos. 25, 57, 76 and 186 would mean that the new provisions will not apply to 1987-88. Amendment No. 27 would mean that we could not make any reports and supplementary reports for 1987-88 using current practices on total and relevant expenditure. The result would be chaos for local government, so I urge hon. Members to reject the amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Question proposed, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Several hon. Members rose——

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means: I will call hon. Members who are rising. Perhaps I should remind the Committee that it is not in order to cover ground that has already been covered in the debate on the amendments.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): If I trespass on that ruling, Sir Paul, I am sure you will tell me. I want to refer to exchanges between myself and the Secretary of State in the debate on Monday on the first group of amendments in relation to the powers of the Secretary of State over the courts. I submit, Sir Paul, that any matter covered in that debate which was not satisfactorily concluded because of differences of opinion must, under the rules of the Committee, be in order now. In particular, I draw your attention to the exclusion of clause 6(4) which was considered with the first group of amendments.

On Monday the Secretary of State intervened in my speech and said;

"I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was here when I spoke to the amendment, but, even if he was, he does not seem to have heard me. I think that, if he had listened, he would agree that he has the wrong brief." — [Official Report, 19 January 1987; Vol. 108, c. 657.]

I went on to make some remarks to which the Secretary of State obviously took exception. I have read the debate several times and I wish to respond to what the Secretary of State said. What I wish to say may overlap some of the points of order that were raised earlier today. I apologise to the Committee for not being here but I was upstairs at the time chairing a Select Committee.

There are three strands to the Bill, as is recognised by everybody—validation of previous practice into statute, further measures in respect of rate limitati restriction of court jurisdiction. I have sent a lett Secretary of State setting out the points that I bringing to the attention of the Committee. The S of State must reply to those points at the end of th at a future date or by letter. I am glad to see the assenting to that.

On the first point, the validation of previous in statute, we all agree that that is necessary statement to the House on 16 December, the Sec State made it clear that that was what the Bill about. He said that it would

"validate for England and Wales all past decisions the use of relevant or total expenditure and allow to be properly taken for the remainder of the pre support grant system, in line with the practice hitherto been adopted." — [Official Report, 16 1986; Vol. 107, c. 1051.]

I emphasise the last words.

When we came to it, the Secretary of Stat admitted in the debate on Monday that there addition to that. He said:

"I plead guilty, if guilt is involved, in that the further than pure validation in regard to rate limit [Official Report, 19 January 1987; Vol. 108, c. 640

So we have a second element in the Bill which doe restore the status quo ante but sweeps away the w of negotiation and determination which h embarked on with several local authorities.

The third element, the one where I differ mos with the Secretary of State, is on restrictions jurisdiction. The Secretary of State says that beca cases are still to be concluded on the basis of t it stands, but not after the Bill gets Royal Assent, that it is necessary, in respect of the measures c the validation procedure, to ensure that the dete of the court will be consistent with the law as it w the Bill becomes an Act, rather than with the stood when the case was being heard. He seek that change by clause 4(6). That provision ne prospective, as well as retrospective, since i possible for a judgment to be made before or af Assent. However, it has further consequences reduces the effective power of the courts over m would have been justiciable even if no fault had b in the legislation. Secondly, it applies to a range in the additional provisions of the Bill. retrospective aspects that are unacceptable.

In respect of the matters to whose ado Secretary of State pleaded guilty we have p jurisdiction as well. I accused the Secretary o court-capping in that he was covering not only where hearings are completed but in which no has been made, but future cases. Clause 6(4) clause 7 and to schedule 2 which covers the authorities for which complicated formulae a That stems from the additional powers that the of State requires. Of course, there could be li respect of those.

Determination and notification are very imp clause 6(4) the Secretary of State rules out anyth will have a contrary effect on such notific determination. By putting clause 6(4) into the saying that his executive power will be w jurisdiction of the court because the words effect" do not have an obverse effect but an effe from the notification and determination by order or by whatever executive means the Secretary of State wishes to use.

The Secretary of State clearly thought that I was wrong in what I said on Monday. I am justifying and showing the Committee where I think he is wrong. In the closing part of that debate a remarkable exchange took place between the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). The Secretary of State had talked about retrospective powers for the courts. I interrupted to remind him that it was to be a matter of prospective executive limitation of the courts as well. In reply he said:

"Therefore, any concept that there can be a challenge to decisions in the courts is a challenge to Parliament because Parliament will have enacted the legislation and these will be the provisions."

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury rose immediately and said:

"Any subsequent challenge to the designation or rate capping of a specific authority would be a challenge not to Parliament but to the exercise by the Secretary of State of general powers that are given to him by this statute and, in part, included in schedule 2, which does not specify individual authorities, except in a number of specific cases. It does not specify actual figures but it specifies formulae that will be subject to a report or an order to be tabled by the Secretary of State giving his administrative decision." — [Official Report, 19 January 1987; Vol. 108, c. 671.]

It is therefore clear that the Secretary of State is indeed taking unprecedented executive powers by virtue of clauses 4(6) and 6(4). The Secretary of State does not know what is in his own Bill or he does not know the British constitution or, conceivably, he knows neither.

As I understand it—it has not been challenged—the liberty of the subject in this realm depends partly on the separation of the powers of the Executive, the legislature and the judiciary. Once the Executive begins to encroach on powers of judicial determination which are properly those of the judiciary, it is taking the judiciary's powers as well as its own.

I have telescoped somewhat the terms of the letter that I have written to the Secretary of State, but I think that I have incorporated all of its essentials. I hope that the Minister for Local Government will feel able to reply. The Secretary of State is wrong in terms of the constitution. He is wrong to take powers which he must not and should not have if the liberty of the individual and corporate subject is to be protected.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Although it is quite true that the more objectionable clauses which insert wholly new matter into local government finance come later, there are aspects of clause 1 which make it unacceptable. If we were simply making the law what we thought it was, we would accept clause 1, but subsection 6(b) goes way beyond what is required to validate the existing law. It is a catch-all subsection and makes the clause unattractive.

The Government are saying that they made a mistake and that they are determined to get the law right. In so doing, however, they have inserted subsection (6) which means that it will not be possible for local authorities to conduct their business legitimately and properly in terms of their powers and their constitution as corporate bodies.

We object to other aspects of the Bill, but on those grounds we would not want clause 1 to be incorporated into the Bill.

Dr. Boyson: I shall be brief because we have spoken at length on the amendments.

I have listened to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing). His letter was delivered today, I believe, and I have a copy of it with me. I believe that a reply, which will be with the hon. Member shortly, is being prepared. What he has said is fairly technical, but clause 4 is substantially involved.

Clause 1 requires local authorities to keep for the financial year 1987-88, and in all subsequent financial years, a rate fund revenue account. It provides for certain items of account which must be included in the rate fund revenue account and provides that expenditure and income debited or credited to the accounts that are listed in schedule 1, or to any other account specified by the Secretary of State, should not be debited or credited to the rate fund revenue account.

The rate fund revenue accounts that we are requiring will be similar to, if not the same as, the traditional non-statutory rate fund revenue accounts which authorities have kept until now. As I have said, we shall keep the present system as far as possible.

The rate fund revenue account is fundamental to the method of calculating total and relevant expenditure as laid down in clause 1. I hope that the Committee will accept the clause.

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend, the Member for Newham, North-East——

Mr. Spearing: Newham, South.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Keir Hardie's old seat.

Mr. Straw: And also the area where my mother was the headmistress of a school, so I ought to remember it. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) have made our objections to clause 1, and we shall divide the Committee.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): Some of us feel that clause 1 must be part of the Bill. I fully support what my hon. Friend the Minister said.

I referred on Monday to the Audit Commission report on the London boroughs. It speaks of bad management and poor industrial relations. There is a need for proper accounting procedures in many Labour-controlled authorities, especially those which have been criticised often in the House, which cover 5·8 million people.

The problems were described in the Evening Standard of 2 December under the heading, "London is going bankrupt." The article said:

"London is heading for bankruptcy, the head of the local government finance watchdog warned today".

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hind: Poor management and bad control over expenditure are at the root of those comments. The vast majority of local authorities do not need the clear guidelines that are laid down in clause 1.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hind: Many Labour-controlled authorities need it spelling out. People who expect local authorities to collect and spend money responsibly will respect that point of view.

[Mr. Hind]

Housing has been mentioned. Some authorities are not collecting money from their tenants. Liverpool has arrears of £7·5 million.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I am finding it difficult to relate what the hon. Gentleman is saying to clause 1. He must speak to clause 1.

Mr. Hind: I apologise if I have drifted. The structure that clause 1 lays down is badly needed in many local authorities because of their failure simply to collect the rent. In June last year, Southwark had arrears of £24 million.

Mr. Dobson: On a point of order, Sir Paul. The clause does not relate to housing accounts. The hon. Gentleman referred to housing accounts.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I shall give the hon. Member an opportunity to relate his remarks to the clause. I am sure that he will do so.

Mr. Hind: I shall follow your ruling on this matter, Sir Paul. Deferred payments have enabled local authorities to get around the structures of the previous legislation. Again, this needs to be sorted out. We do not wish to saddle our children with burdens caused by the inefficient, poor management of Labour authorities who borrow money today. Money should be properly collected. Lambeth Council has 64,000 unprocessed housing benefit claims, and 923 are more than three years old.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member again. This is not a general debate; it is a clause stand part debate. The hon. Member's remarks must relate directly to clause 1.

Mr. Hind: Proper accounting practices are required. Many local authorities do not follow proper accounting practices. It is necessary to impose them upon them. For that reason, I welcome this clause.

Question put, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill:—

The Government have still not got it right.

I want to know when reading
"Rate fund revenue accounts: further provisions", what those further provisions are. The histo legislation under this Government has been one of

to impose central Government's will on democratically elected local government to force them to cut services and make people redundant and one of central Government taking powers to interfere even in the minute details of local government finance and the way in which local authorities organise their accounts and financial affairs. This clause is no exception. The amendments try to do something about that.

We are again considering "proper practices" — the new concept dreamed up by the Government to enable them to impose their will on the way in which local authorities keep their accounts. Not only the whole of local government, whether Conservative, Labour or alliance authorities, but professional people involved in local government finance — auditors and others — are worried about this.

The Government's stated purpose in clauses 1 to 3 is to change the method of calculating relevant and total expenditure for rate support grant purposes to bring the law into line with the practices followed since 1981. The Minister has again spelt that out. Transfers of cash from the rate fund revenue account to other accounts or special funds are classed as expenditure and transfers from such accounts back to the rate fund revenue account are classed as income.

However, clause 2(4) goes well beyond that purpose, just as every aspect of the Bill goes beyond the purposes that the Government claim for it. It gives the Secretary of State unfettered powers—once again—now and in the future to specify what will count as income and expenditure for rate fund revenue account purposes. The Government are taking unto themselves, outside Parliament's control, the power to specify what will count as income and expenditure for every local authority. As we heard in the previous debate, that includes giving the Secretary of State the power to look at the smallest type of account kept by local authorities as well as the rate fund revenue account.

One of the creative accountancy devices that local authorities have used commonly in recent years, rightly, to keep their expendiure above the level required by the Secretary of State while avoiding massive penalties — there is nothing wrong with that as long as it is within the law—has been the transfer of money to special accounts for use in special years. It is good housekeeping to save up this year so that one can spend the money next year. If a householder did that, the Prime Minister and the Minister would compliment him on being prudent and on thinking of the future, but if a local authority does that it will now be penalised. This subsection could be used to block off those devices, prevent local authorities saving for the future and could force authorities to impose massive rate rises, if they can, or, if they are rate-capped, to make cuts.

7.30 pm

The powers that are sought in the subsection go well beyond the stated intention of the Bill and the Government should come clean about the legislation and admit what they are doing. This is another piece in a long line of 12 pieces of legislation to control and to take more powers over local government. The powers are subject neither to parliamentary scrutiny nor to consultation with authorities. We were at least given those a previous Secretaries of State for the Envirc they passed their rate-capping and other leg

The powers are left totally at large and i whether internal transfers of cash from accou are caught by the procedures specified in cla clear that transfers of cash from an external rate fund revenue account are caught in tha Secretary of State says they are.

The legislation does not just validat happened in the past. It alters the way in happened because it gives the Secretary of St alter the practices of the past and to p authorities from taking advantage, as they ha to in the past, of those transfers, which were l been validated, but which will now be made Secretary of State so determines, not if P determines. Income from external sources to the rate account often emanates from sources that ma in professional accountancy terms, as capita There are a number of different professional that issue. The power that the Secretary of S under clause 2(4) holds out the possibility of unlawful only a certain number of the practices that are currently used. That is ba because it is unclear from the Bill what use will make of those sweeping powers. By mini many local authorities could be deprived of n of pounds of revenue income. If the Secretary total discretion, and if past performance is a on, he will deprive Labour local authorities pounds of income and turn a blind eye to local authorities, or even to some hung Labour local authorities in areas in which son Friends have marginal seats. The Minister clear assurances as to how that power will b

Amendments Nos. 33, 36, 38 and 39 deal concept of "proper practices", which will be u Ministers to interfere in even more deta authority financial activities. The amendm restore some discretion to local authoritie believer in local government and in the need be able to alter the nature of and the way i local authority is run by voting in a local el support the amendments. We are restoring local authorities in relation to accounting pr are heavily circumscribed by clause 2(3). Th fails to give a fair definition of "proper pra

My hon. Friends and I have asked the Mi five times, in Committee and on Second Read the words "proper practices". We still have that definition. The subsection still fails to definition, although it seeks to describe thos being applicable to the entry of the sort o expenditure that the Bill requires to be char rate fund revenue account. What on earth do The Government should clarify the mean practices, and our amendments give the Gov opportunity.

The amendments would also broaden the cover any practices applicable for the time entry of items of account into such a fund. In local authorities would be allowed to continue acting, in the same way as in the past, which has been legal and proper, and which internal and external auditors have already validated. That would give local authority treasurers some opportunity to exercise professional judgment in the application of accounting practices in areas that are covered by the Bill.

Amendment No. 37 is significant because it would remove the retrospective element from the definition of "proper practices". Retrospective provisions and retrospective legislation are, all other things being equal, bad legislation. If the legislation validated the previous custom and practice as legal—as everyone believed—and merely corrected that, as my hon. Friends and I have said earlier, there would not be a problem. However, it does not. The retrospective elements concerning the definition of "proper practices" introduces an entirely new concept.

At present, clause 2(3) applies the rather vague definition of the practices as being or, in other words the financial year 1986-87. Amendment No. 37 would remove those words, with the result that the definition of requirements flowing from it would take effect from the date of Royal Assent. Therefore, the retrospective nature of the legislation would be removed, without any detriment to local or central Government.

We do not see any reason why there should be retrospection when it is not necessary, or even why it should be applied at all. It is not designed to prevent the retrospective validation in law of what has happened, nor does it alter the difficulties that central and local government now face in paying out rate support grant if the Bill becomes an Act. On the contrary, it seeks to further certainty in local government finance by preventing the retrospective application of proper practices. The authority requirements of clause 1 are intended to take effect from 1987-88 onwards. The Government should explain why those proper practices should take effect from 1986-87 when there is no need for the entirely new concept that has nothing to do with validating what has previously happened.

Opposition Members, and, I am sure, some Conservative Back Benchers, are amazed at the nature of the legislation and at the outrageous statements that Ministers are making to justify it. Ministers have staggered from one disaster to another. Unless they take on board the intent of our amendments and accept some of the constructive points made by Opposition Members, and if the legislation reaches the statute book without serious amendment, Ministers will be setting themselves up for another series of disasters and will be in the same difficulties in future as they are now.

As I have said, that all goes to prove that central Government cannot run the affairs of local government as well as the locally elected councillors and their chief and other officers.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I shall concentrate briefly on two amendments in this group. I agree entirely with the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) that amendment No. 37 contains no requirement whatever for retrospection. The subsection concentrates on the issue of proper practices, which seems to be an obsession with the Government. As there is no requirement for the validation of the £70 billion of local government expenditure to have retrospection in relation to proper practice, I accept the terms of amendment No. 37.

One issue that has been hardly touched on by hon Members either on Monday or today is that the professio of the auditor appears to be called into question by the wa in which the Government have presented the legislation In that context, amendment No. 34 is extremel important. I have a high regard for the internal audit o local government. In my time in local government, I hav known many auditors employed by the local authorit who exercised their authority to point out bad practice and to ensure that they were rectified without fear o favour from departments within the local authority.

The provision also demeans the practice of extern auditors. It does not matter whether they are profession or district auditors: the fact is that the external audit local government is held in high regard and should not b diminished by the Government's proposals.

The way in which the Government take powers themselves says to auditors, "We do not trust you and w alone will be the arbiters of what is proper practice; we w set the one route down which you must go." It is sayi to the external auditors, "We do no even accept your hi standards."

As I said in an earlier debate, the distinction betwe what is legitimate accounting, which seems to make t cost advantageous use of local authority resources, a what I would regard as improper practice, is whether course of action can be sustained within the policies of t Government of the day. If it cannot and it has to rescued by some future Government, then I would rega it as improper. The interesting thing is that case after c that has fallen into the latter category has been picked by external audit. It is not something that has been hidd It has been pointed out, and some cases have gone to courts. The report to which the hon. Member Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) referred, however badly incorrectly, has come into the public eye. It was hidden.

The present practices and methods of audit have served to expose that which ought to be exposed. Ther no necessity for the proposals on proper practice in cla 2. That is why amendment No. 34 is important. It acce the professional standards of the auditors and says t there can be alternative practices, as long as they approved by the auditors. That is where the responsibi properly lies. It should not lie prescriptively with Government to say that there is one narrow road d which we must go and that there is no diversion fro Therefore, the important aspects of this group amendments are that they remove retrospection, whic not necessary, and trust the powers and professi standards of the auditors.

Mr. Pike: These amendments are important. They to bring the position as close as possible to that whic understood to be in existence prior to the legislation b introduced. The way in which the clause is worded c lead to a retrograde step. It challenges not only political judgment of local authorities, of whatever p but the professional judgment of officers, whether the executive officer, the borough treasurer, the internal system or, as the hon. Member for Leeds, West Meadowcroft) pointed out, even the external audit sy It is left solely to the Government to decide what determine to be "proper practices". I wonder why we should believe that the Government are the only people who have the ability to determine what is proper practice. It is the wrong direction in which to be moving.

7.45 pm

The phrase "proper practice" appears in the clause on several occasions. It is very vague and does not say what the Government mean. However, we know that the Government are trying to prevent what they see as creative accountancy. However, creative accountancy has come into being only because of the actions of the Government and the way in which they have dealt with local government in recent years. I have been connected with local government for many years in one way or another. Ten years ago the phrase "creative accounting" had not even been heard of. I am sure that many people who served on local councils never got to know what the phrase meant.

I have always accepted that, at the end of the day, the Government have the right to determine how much money they are prepared to give to local government. I believe that the House and local government have the right to argue about whether that amount is sufficient to meet the needs of local areas. I believe that the Government have gone wrong by failing to make sufficient money available. I accept, although I do not like it, that they have the right to determine that figure. However, they have tried to deprive councils of the freedom to raise locally what people are prepared to pay in additional income to the council to enable it to provide the services that are required.

I believe that when councils provide the necessary services they are looking responsibly at the needs and requirements of the communities they represent, whether that be domestic ratepayers, industry or commerce. All councils know that if their areas are to survive they must maintain industry and commerce. No council puts up rates deliberately to punish industry or anybody else. Domestic ratepayers have a direct say in whether they are satisfied that the council is doing its job correctly and meeting the needs of the community.

As councillors we found it difficult every year. We knew what we wanted and needed to do to meet the needs of the community, but that had to be balanced by what we could do and by what we could ask the ratepayers to pay. If the clause is not amended it will limit the power of councils to try to get the best possible deal for the people they represent. It is the duty of councillors, from whichever party, to do their best for the people in their communities. That is not only the responsibility of the councillors, but it is the task of the officers. As long as councils work within the law and are acting in the interests of the community I believe that they will be using "proper practices" to protect the interests of those they represent.

While I was the leader of the council I had to take the chairmanship of the local authority finance committee for a year because the chairman of finance became the mayor of the borough. We set up a fund to finance a project to convert an existing listed building next to the town hall into an arts centre and theatre. That opened last year. The officers said to the leaders of the council that if we put a certain amount into a special fund we would incur penalities because we would spend more than the Government would permit. However, they said that we would receive grant at a higher level then the penalties. Therefore, we decided to put money into the fund because that was in the best interests of the people we represented. I am sure that the Minister will say that we were wrong to do that. However, I would argue that we were acting in the best interest of the community by putting the money to one side, benefiting the ratepayers in future years by the equivalent of a penny rate.

If the clause stands in its present form, I am sure that the Government will be able to decide that what we did was not proper practice and that it would be outside the provisions of this legislation. That is just one example. I could give many others, but I do not intend to do so because we wish to make progress.

If the Government are not prepared to accept one or more of the amendments and to try to move in the direction that we seek, it will be yet another blow to local government, another restriction, another limitation on the ability of local authorities to meet the requirements of the people whom they represent. At the end of the day, it is local government that knows what is best for the people in the area. Before 1979, the Government said that they would give freedom to local government, which has been referred to many times in earlier debates. Everything that the Government have done has been in the opposite direction.

We believe that local authorities should have more powers and the ability to finance what they do, although I accept that, while we may argue strongly about the figure that the Government say they are prepared to put in, the Government have the right to determine exactly what they wish to pay. The clause should not remain as drafted. It was unnecessary for the Government to draft it in that way to deal with the problem that has arisen as a result of their own legislation. The Government are wrong, yet once again they are striking a blow at local government.

Mr. Clelland: It is not only unreasonable and unfair but unnecessary for the Government to impose these further restrictions on local authorities. After all, in their accounting practices and finances, local authorities are more open than any other organisation, probably including even central Government. Local government accounts can be scrutinised by electors and auditors. They are run in a professional manner by the treasurers and finance officers who are responsible for them. Therefore, one must ask why the Government feel it necessary to introduce the concept of "proper practices" into rate support grant law.

We know that "proper practices" are already exercised by the auditor, or at least he has to see that the authority has observed proper practices in compiling its accounts, but apparently the Government now wish to apply the concept also to rate support grant law. It is not as if that was the only thing that the Government were doing. Apart from imposing the concept of proper practices in the clause, they intend to provide the Secretary of State with yet more power to specify expenditure or income that is to be regarded as of a revenue nature. Thus there is a double-pronged attack on local authorities. The Opposition think that that is unnecessary. The Minister should explain the necessity for the provision, if the Government feel that it is necessary.

A full explanation would be appreciated, particularly in the light of the Government's record of explaining their decisions. The Minister will recall that I have had considerable correspondence with the Department about the reason why Newcastle city council was refused disregards. I appreciate the reply that I received yesterday to a letter that I wrote to the Department in October last year. The reply has taken a long time to come to me; it arrived yesterday and tells me no more than what the Minister's predecessor told me, which is that the Minister will not tell me anything. If that is the practice that will be adopted, not only will local government have to observe proper practices that are not defined, but it may not even be given an explanation of why it is in breach of proper practices that were not defined in the first place, after the Minister imposed them. That is the ridiculous maze that local government finance is entering.

I support the amendment. I hope that, in his reply, the Minister will explain to the House a little more fully exactly what the proper practices are intended to be.

Mr. Tony Banks: I wish to speak to the various amendments on proper practices. I should like, first, however, to take the opportunity to correct something said by the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) when he spoke in the clause stand part debate. It relates to the financial practices of local authorities. He said that the Audit Commission chief, John Banham, had suggested that Labour local authorities in London were heading towards bankruptcy. In justification of that accusation, he quoted a story in an edition of the London Evening Standard in December. He could have gone on to quote a story that appeared on Sunday in the Sunday Telegraph, a newspaper that I have been keeping about my person since the debate started, drawing some comments from the Minister for doing so.

We must get the record absolutely straight. The stories that have appeared in the Tory newpapers such as the London Evening Standard and the Sunday Telegraph bear little relation to what John Banham actually said. We know that the stories are all part of the generalised Tory onslaught on Labour local authorities. In particular, inner London Labour-controlled authorities have found themselves virtually sinking below the financial waters because of Government policies, loss of rate support grant and so on—all the things that we keep discussing in the House. In various ways they have tried to mitigate the impact of Government policies, and in doing so have become involved in several accounting practices that the Government now wish to proscribe.

It must be said that none of the things that local authorities have done in creative accounting have been declared illegal. That is the important point. It is the Secretary of State's practices that have been effectively declared unlawful or illegal, hence the need for the Bill. Before one starts throwing accusations around about the special accounting practices of Labour-controlled authorities, one should bear it in mind that at no stage has anyone been able to say that those are illegal practices.

Following the story that appeared in the London Evening Standard, councillor Margaret Hodge, who chairs the Association of London Authorities, wrote to John Banham and asked him for his comments. The hon. Member for Lancashire, West used the comments in the London Evening Standard as a rerun of his speech on Second Reading and of that which he delivered on the first day of the Committee stage. He has only one speech, and I suspect that we shall hear it time and again before we reach the end of the Bill.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): The hon. Gentleman has only one speech.

Mr. Banks: My speeches vary.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Only marginally.

Mr. Banks: My speeches vary in content and pitch, and in the general level of boredom, hysteria, humour, intelligence or whatever, so at least I can say that I vary the pace somewhat. But the hon. Member for Lancashire, West has a line and he sticks to it. He ain't ever going to give way to anyone. He is deliberate in his policy. Obviously, he pursues a policy of cerebral hygiene. He does not want to be given information, so he ploughs on. I am prepared to give way to any Conservative Member who wishes to intervene.

I return to the article that the hon. Member for Lancashire, West quoted from the London Evening Standard and the comments ascribed to John Banham, the chief of the Audit Commission. Mr. Banham described the report as "inaccurate", and said:

> "My paper made it clear that the commission was not in favour of privatisation as a universal prescription.
> At no time did I suggest that there was any possibility of local authorities in London or anywhere else becoming technically bankrupt.
> Indeed I made the point explicitly that borrowing ratios in local government were relatively modest by private sector standards."

That is what John Banham said in response to the stories that appeared in the London Evening Standard. Some hon. Members might have heard the erudite speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall, who probably has a far greater grasp of economics than anybody else in the House. He made precisely the same point. The Secretary of State laughs. He is not the person to go around bragging about his economic prowess. I suggest that if he wants to challenge my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall to a debate about economics, he will get the whipping of his life.

Mr. Meadowcroft: The hon. Gentleman rightly referred to what Mr. Banham said and the correction that he made. The hon. Gentleman is also aware that I am no lover of the line purveyed in this Chamber regularly by the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind). Does he accept that Councillor Mrs. Hodge has also written a long article in the current edition of New Socialist in which she refers explicitly to the accounting practices of Islington and makes the point very straightforwardly that unless a future Labour Government were to do something retrospectively about money, the so-called dented shield that she and her colleagues in the Labour party have been urged to hold up would be unable to survive? The accounting practices in Islington have fallen on the wrong side of the division to which I referred earlier and cannot be sustained within the philosophy of the Government of the day. To my mind, therefore, they are improper.

Mr. Banks: The hon. Gentleman is correct in part. Local authorities that have attempted to defend jobs and services—they are probably the most hard-pressed local authorities in the country—have been caught up in a major problem. In attempting to defend jobs and services they have involved themselves in financial accounting practices that would be difficult to sustain if there were another Conservative Government.

Labour local authorities, in particular Labour local authorities in London, are doing certain things upon the assumption that there will be another Labour Government. I do not believe that the structure of local authority finance can survive another Conservative Government. Those local authorities have taken a risk. It is a high risk strategy, but it is justifiable in terms of what they are seeking to do. I am very honest and straightforward about what is going on in local authorities in London, and their high risk strategy requires a Labour Government. If we do not have another Labour Government, local authority finance will be destroyed. It will be the Government's baby.

I have suggested that we should say to the Government, "It is impossible for us financially to manage this local authority; the Government must now take over the running of the local authority so that the people in the area will see who is truly responsible for the impact on the services within the area." One of the problems that the dented shield philosophy poses for Labour authorities is that they are blamed by the local electorate for the decline in the standard of services, although the blame should be laid firmly at the Government's door.

Mr. Ridley: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that his hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and the leadership of the party to which he belongs have made it clear that they will not bail out the Labour authorities? It is indeed an extremely high risk strategy. If it is not right for the Labour party to bail out these authorities, why does the hon. Gentleman suggest that the Conservatives should bail them out? If all parties—including, I believe, the party of the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft)—are of this opinion, the risk is so high that it must have been absurdly reckless to undertake it.

Mr. Banks: No, I do not agree. It does not greatly surprise me that my views and those of my hon. Friend on the Opposition Front Bench are different. I am not aspiring to high office. Therefore, I can preserve the degree of personal candour that perhaps cannot be retained by others—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I make that point in a friendly and amicable fashion, but I can stand up and speak my mind in this place without fear or favour.

It is not a question of bailing out the local authorities. I understand that a Labour Government will restore the relationship between centrally funded services and locally funded services. They will return the rate support grant to the point where it bears some relationship to the position that existed before 1979. That would solve the majority of the financial problems that are now faced by Labour local authorities.

It goes much further than that. Labour local authorities are not involved merely in trying to get round this or that specific Act in terms of their accounting practices. They also have to deal with the impact on their local communities of central Government policies across the whole spectrum. For example, the Government's economic policies have a major national impact on unemployment.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The clause relates to accountancy methods, not to how the money is counted. We are now talking about the amount of money and how it is distributed. We ought to return to the clause.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Member for Newham, North West (Mr. Banks) is now suggesting that a future Labour Government would restore rate support grant to the 64 or 65 per cent. level of 1979.

Mr. Banks: It was 61 per cent.

Mr. Ridley: Very well, 61 per cent. I could not remember the exact figure. I wonder whether the Opposition Front Bench would confirm that suggestion. It is important that the local authorities should be aware of precisely what the position is.

The Chairman: Order. Important though it may be, I do not think that its importance is related to the substance of the clause that is before the Committee. I hope that we shall return to accountancy.

Mr. Banks: Indeed, Mr. Walker. I am exploring the areas of broader concern and interest in order to explain why local authorities have become involved in special accounting practices. I take your point that that relates to counting the money. However, one needs to know how much money one has before one starts to allocate it. Local authorities find that they do not get the same sort of money as they used to get from central Government. I am as interested in the reply to that question as is the Secretary of State: whether the next Labour Government will be taking rate support grant, in terms of central Government contribution, back to the percentages that were achieved during the period of the last Labour Government. I shall willingly give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) if he wishes to confirm the point.

I rose merely to correct a very misleading newspaper story that was quoted by the hon. Member for Lancashire, West. I am afraid that it will be necessary on a regular basis to correct the distortions of Conservative Members about the policies and the financial practices of Labour local authorities. They are staying within the law. That is why the law keeps being changed. If the local authorities were acting unlawfully, the district auditor would be able to move in on them, the ratepayers would be able to take them to court and they could be accused of not fulfilling their fiduciary duties in respect of rate-borne expenditure. None of that has happened. It is the Secretary of State, not Labour local authorities, who is in the dock. Therefore, it is absolutely misleading and incorrect for Conservative Members to start pointing the finger at Labour local authorities when the real lawbreakers, the real recidivists, are sitting on their own Front Bench tonight.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Christopher Chope): We have had two debates on this group of amendments. The latter debate, initiated by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), gave us a fascinating and candid insight into the debate taking place in the Labour party about the extent to which inner London councils run by that party are already bankrupt or about to become bankrupt, and about the extent to which any future Labour Government would be prepared to bail out those councils. We have already heard about the philosophy of the dented shield. The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) ought to reply to the debate and I hope that in due course he will have opportunity to explain where he stands on the important issues raised by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West.

Probably much less interesting to hon. Members but nevertheless important for people outside who are trying to follow the proceedings on this Bill has been the main debate on this group of amendments which was initiated by the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts). I noted that most of his remarks were addressed to clause 2(4) which is the subject matter not of this group of amendments but of the next group. For that reason I hope that he will forgive me for not replying in detail to the points that he made. He said that clause 2 was ominous. It is ominous only to someone who does not understand it. With the indulgence of the Committee, I shall read some quite lengthy notes on what clause 2 is all about.

These amendments relate to the rate revenue account, and it may assist the Committee if before dealing with the detail of the amendments I explain the general approach that we are adopting in the Bill to the rate fund revenue account.

Clauses 1 and 2 of the Bill set up in statute the rate fund revenue account for the purposes of the new statutory definition of relevant and total expenditure which is in keeping with the current approach that in practice we have adopted for relevant and total expenditure. Although not required to do so by statute, local authorities have in general kept an account of their main revenue transactions —an account which has often been known as the rate fund revenue account. Current practice on relevant and total expenditure, as distinct from the statutory provisions in the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, has been to calculate relevant and total expenditure by reference to these traditional rate fund revenue accounts, Therefore, the provisions in the Bill, which are designed to maintain the status quo on relevant and total expenditure, introduce into statute the concept of the rate fund revenue account.

I must stress that this concept is introduced solely for the purposes of providing a statutory definition of relevant and total expendiure. It is not an attempt to control local authority spending, nor is it an attempt to regulate local authority accounting. As mentioned in earlier debates in Committee, my right hon. Friend already has powers under section 23 of the Local Government Finance Act 1982 to make regulations about such matters as the form of accounts and statements of accounts. I remind the Committee that my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment, Countryside and Planning, when he was Minister for Local Government, announced on 28 February 1986 that we had decided not to make new regulations on local authority accounts, but to invite the local authority associations in conjunction with the Audit Commission and accountancy bodies to set up their own arrangement for dealing with accounts. This remains the Government's position, and I am pleased to tell the Committee that the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy together with officers of the Audit Commission have now prepared a draft code of practice on local authority accounts on which they are currently seeking comments from local government and other interested parties.

The provisions of the Bill are designed so that the statutory rate fund revenue account which authorities will be required to keep for 1987-88 and subsequent years will be very similar, if not the same, as the traditional non-statutory rate fund revenue accounts which authorities have in general been keeping. The starting point is that in clause 1 the rate fund revenue account is identified as the account to which all revenue expenditure and income must be debited or credited — with the exception of that revenue expenditure or income which is properly debited or credited to certain other accounts. The revenue expenditure and income to be excluded is not simply that which is properly debited or credited to any other account kept by the authority, since expenditure and income included in memorandum accounts — such as the account for section 137 expenditure — should also be included in the rate fund revenue account. This is the way the non-statutory rate fund revenue account has traditionally been kept. The main accounts, the expenditure and income of which are to be excluded from the rate fund revenue account, are specified in schedule 1. The power for my right hon. Friend to make specifications under clause 1(6)(b) will enable us to cope with any other such accounts, including any such accounts established by local Acts.

In addition to revenue expenditure and income, other items of account can be included in the rate fund revenue account, such as contributions to special funds or certain capital expenditure, where this conforms to proper accounting practices. Clause 2 provides that these practices are any practices drawn from the practices applicable to the traditional non-statutory rate fund revenue accounts in 1986-87, but taking into account variations in practice occurring from time to time. I should say something about proper practices. Local authorities prepare their accounts according to proper practices and a local authority's auditor is required to satisfy himself under the Local Government Finance Act 1982 that proper practices have been observed in the compilation of the accounts. These practices are not set out in statute, and accountants and auditors—in particular the professional accountancy institutes—have developed, and continue to develop, accounting practices which are considered proper for local authority accounts. The Bill does not specify precisely what the proper practices are. As I have already made clear, it is not our intention to interfere with local authority accounting. Clause 2 of the Bill provides that the practices to be applied to the statutory rate fund revenue accounts are those applicable in 1986-87 to traditional non-statutory rate fund revenue accounts, but will take account of variations of practice occurring from time to time.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Has the Minister seen the draft code prepared by CIPFA? It looks at the points that we have been debating about the difference between reserving money and providing for committed expenditure. The Minister talks about things being included in the rate fund account and ordinary practice, but they are already contained in the code. I am baffled as to why he has to go through this great rigmarole when what has been proposed and sent out for consultation covers the points that he is making.

Mr. Chope: I shall come to the point about why it is necessary to set out in this clause the relationship with proper practices. I have not read the detail of the substantial volume that has been produced as a code of proper accounting practice. If in this clause the Government were defining one sort of proper practice and saying that no local authority could adopt any other practice, perhaps even one which had hitherto been regarded as proper, then local government would have cause for complaint.

In order to emphasise that the status quo has been maintained we say that anything which has been proper accounting practice can be taken into account. We say that when the authority compiles its rate fund revenue account for 1987-88 it can select such practices as it considers appropriate from the body of practices that were applicable in 1986-87. That is why amendments Nos. 33 and 34 are unnecessary. I ask the Committee to reject them.

Allegations were made that amendments Nos. 35 to 39 were sinister because they were retrospective. I hope that I can demonstrate to the Committee that the only way in which they are retrospective is that they refer back to proper accounting practices being used at present. If we do not refer back to those practices it is hard to know what they are when we talk about defining them in the Bill.

Amendments Nos. 35 to 39 seek to remove any connection between the practices to be used for compiling statutory rate fund revenue accounts with the practices applicable in 1986-87 to non-statutory rate fund revenue accounts. The result of that would be that the practices to be used for compiling the new statutory rate fund revenue accounts would merely be practices properly applied to that new account.

As the statutory account is a new entity, no one would know what these practices are. The point that the Opposition have made is that by the issue of these accounts we are creating a situation whereby local authorities will not know where they stand. If the amendments proposed by the Opposition were to be passed, local authorities would indeed be able to complain that they were in the dark, because no one would know what the practices were.

If the statute is to provide for the new rate fund revenue account to be like the traditional rate fund revenue account, we must refer to the practices that apply to that traditional account. This is best done by referring to the practices that are applicable to the traditional non-statutory accounts kept for 1986-87, which is the last year before authorities are required to keep the new statutory accounts, and take account of variations in practices occurring from time to time.

This is a complicated subject, but it has been made more complicated by the failure of Opposition Members to understand what it is about, and their attempts to raise the spectre that this is introducing something sinister. This clause is designed to help local authorities prepare for the new definition set out in this Bill, and I hope that the Committee will reject the amendments.

Mr. Allan Roberts: What a tangled web we weave. The purpose of this complicated legislation, in the words of the Minister, is to enable local authorities to know where they stand. The Minister's explanation was about as lucid and illuminating as the clause itself. If, after reading it in Hansard and studying the clause, local authorities know where they stand I shall be amazed.

In this clause, the Secretary of State is taking po unnecessarily to legislate retrospectively. As he i interfere in the day-to-day detail of local auth accounts this complicated plethora of measures is ne to hedge everything about, to make this or that acc clear, to put in to legislation, so that the Governmen validate their own mistakes, what local authorities do anyway. The clause and speech of the Minister hallmarks of the Government's approach to government. All of this is needed because the Govern have decided that they can run local government b than the people who know their own communities who are accountable to their own electorate.

We shall not push these amendments to the vote Minister has attempted to some extent to explain wh Government mean by proper practices. He has said local government is carrying out proper practices. I is so, why do we need this legislation? We need detailed, interfering legislation because the Govern want to control the details of local government interfere. I honestly believed, when some Conserv said that they did not believe in bureaucracy, that meant it, but I am beginning to doubt that.

Amendment negatived.

New clause 6—Consultations—

'No specification under section 2 above shall be before the Chartered Institute of Public Finan Accountancy and the local authority associatio consulted.'.

Mr. Straw: These amendments relate to the powers of the Secretary of State to specify income and expenditure items. The amendments seek to circumscribe the power given to the Secretary of State in clause 2(4) to specify the kinds of income or expenditure that are to be regarded as revenue for the purposes of the rate fund revenue account. Some authorities fear that that power may lead the Secretary of State to take measures by use of the specifications to restrict special accountancy techniques to maintain spending levels.

Ministers have come to Parliament over the last couple of years and given notice that they consider that a particular arrangement should no longer apply. I recollect that that was the case with section 7 of the Rate Support Grants Act last year. As I recall — I stand to be corrected — we did not object to that clause. Do the Government intend — the Minister can inform us when he replies — to deal with special or creative accountancy techniques? I hope that the Minister will make that clear, because, while he may take exception to some of those techniques, they have been accepted by auditors and the district auditor as legitimate in the past, and it is important that authorities should understand their position.

The problems of local authority accounting techniques have changed in the last seven years. They have changed out of all recognition, not just because of the cuts in the absolute level of rate support grant from 61 per cent. to 47 per cent., but because of the impact of target and penalty and the penalty-related block grant that authorities receive.

Once they spend over a certain level they get less rather than more. That has meant that what is brought into account on the revenue side in any given year is of far more critical importance to its revenue than it ever was in the past, when the amount of grant that they received was only broadly related to their expenditure, as was the system before 1980. Marginal changes in given revenue expenditure did not produce the dramatic differences in income through block grant that the system now produces. I hope that the Minister takes that point on board. It is the introduction of these penalty systems — not just the changes of absolute income — that has led authorities to search for other devices to transfer revenue expenditure into forms of capital expenditure.

Amendment No. 41 would impose a 12-month period on any specification issued by the Secretary of State. That is to enable local authorities to have some warning of the terms of any changes in the rules — a point that I have just referred to. It is important that authorities are given breathing space and given notice of the effect that new technical accounting specifications may have on their levels of real income, and therefore expenditure.

Amendments Nos. 45 and 49 would remove the mandatory nature of a specification by the Secretary of State, and in its place he would be entitled to issue advice, which local authorities would have a duty to regard. The Minister will recall that when he was a humble Back-Bencher during the course of proceedings on the Local Government Bill in 1985 there was a lengthy debate — I think it was that Bill and not one of the other endless pieces of local government legislation to which it has been my lot to devote the last four years — [Interruption.]

Mr. Tony Banks: My hon. Friend has done very well.

Mr. Straw: I wish to place on record, for the avoidance of any doubt, that my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, West (Mr. Banks) says that I have done well. I take the compliment in the manner in which it was intended.

We have had many discussions about the nature of a "have regard" duty upon authorities. It is not a light duty. It may not be mandatory, but if anybody ignores a duty to have regard to some requirement in the law, that is actionable. An obvious case is the "Highway Code", to which every driver must have regard, and the code which will be provided at some stage under the Local Government Act 1985.

8.30 pm

A "have regard" duty under amendments Nos. 45 and 49 would not make the Bill unenforceable, but would provide some flexibility so that authorities would have regard to what the Secretary of State was asking, but they would, at the margins, be allowed some freedom of choice in allocating, for example, financial transactions between capital and revenue spending. However, if they went beyond that margin, their decision could be challenged by the auditors and ultimately in the courts.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) has tabled amendment No. 48, but that has not been called so I shall deal with the other amendments. Amendment No. 49 would provide an opportunity for councils to resist a specification. Councils would not be obliged to regard a specification as overriding where their previous decision on whether an item of expenditure or income was revenue was in accordance with the proper practices as defined in the Bill.

Amendment No. 50 would preserve Ministers' opportunities to make specifications, but would only require a local authority to have regard to any specification in determining what to count against its rate fund revenue account.

New clause 6, to which the hon. Member for Leeds, West will no doubt address himself, is designed to provide for consultation with the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy and local authorities. He will no doubt also wish to speak on amendment No. 73.

To return to the point that I made at the outset, all of us wish to see local authority accounts, as with company accounts or any other institution's accounts, in proper order. There is a clear distinction between some capital expenditure and some revenue expenditure. A major housing scheme is plainly capital expenditure. Refuse services are plainly a revenue expenditure. However, many items of expenditure do not have a clear dividing line. For example, at what point does a repair to a property become a major repair which enhances the capital value of a property and could reasonably be regarded as capital expenditure? There are many other areas in which there should be some flexibility.

There is also the matter of into what year certain expenditure should be put. Again, local authorities should be allowed some discretion in that matter, just, as the Minister will know, people who pay tax under schedule D are allowed some discretion, particularly on the opening and closing of a business, as to which year income should be brought into account.

We seek to improve and to introduce greater flexibility into the scheme proposed in clause 2.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I want — as my warm-up man, the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), said earlier — to comment on amendments Nos. 56 and 73, in my name and the names of my hon. Friends, and new clause 6 on consultation.

The first two amendments deal with timing. Those of us who are worried about local government structure and methods of working are anxious to protect the integrity of local government and to assist it to make the changes which will be forced on it by the Bill. I am surprised that the Minister, who has had a long career in local government, is not prepared to accept the need to move slowly from one system to another. There is no way in which it is possible for local authorities suddenly to switch course in midstream and to change their accounting practices — to change the way in which they organise their rate fund revenue accounts. There is no way that they can accommodate such matters simply by diktat overnight. It is arrogant of the Government to say that they do not care about that and will simply order that it be done.

Our amendments, like some of those moved by the hon. Member for Blackburn, seek to say that, if the Government are to force this measure on local government, at least they should give some breathing space during which time local government can organise its accounting practices to cope with the pressures created by the Government. If adequate time is not given to local authorities to make such changes, there are likely to be problems within local authorities, not caused by some malevolent view from within local authorities, but caused by the pressures put on them to make the changes too hastily. We are talking about bodies which spend vast sums of money and employ large numbers of people. Therefore, it is important to make sure that they can carry out such changes in their practices and that due regard is taken of the time it will take.

New clause 6 on consultations is straightforward. The Bill, as now drafted, has consultation with local authority associations written into it. The new clause seeks only to put into a particular part of the Bill, and also to include in the consultation written into the Bill, the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy. I think that there is a misspelling but that is of no crucial importance. It seeks to put CIPFA into that process as a body specifically engaged in accountancy and the practice of accountancy within local authorities. If we do not recognise the status of the profession, we do a disservice to the whole practice of local government. Therefore, it is our wish to write into the Bill the principle of consultation with local authority associations at that point, together with CIPFA. I hope that the Minister, with his experience of local government, will accept the new clause.

Mr. Chope: Amendments Nos. 40 to 43, 45, 47, 49, 50, 53 and 56 all relate to clause 2(4). They all seek to modify or delete the provisions in the Bill relating to my right hon. Friend's powers to make specifications that certain kinds of expenditure and income are to be regarded as of a revenue nature and hence are to be included in the rate fund revenue account unless they should be included in accounts referred to in schedule 1 or specified under clause 1(6). I recommend that all the amendments should be rejected and it may assist the Committee if I explain the background to clause 2(4).

The purpose of these powers is to enable my rig Friend to specify that some item of expenditure or i is of a revenue nature where there may be some dou example, all rate income is normally credited to t fund revenue accounts which authorities traditional kept. We might wish to see that practice continue though it might be argued that that part of rate used to pay for capital expenditure is not of a r nature. In those circumstances, a specification m made stating that all rate income is of a revenue We would need to do this for each year for whi intended that further supplementary reports sho made, as well as for 1987-88 and subsequent year

The powers of clause 2(4) do not permit my rig Friend to specify that some item of expenditure revenue—that is, that it is capital—nor do they for specifications about items which are not expe or income, such as transfers between accounts. I ca the Committee that my right hon. Friend has no in of attempting to say that something is revenue wh whole world thinks is capital.

Mr. Straw: Will the Minister explain the exam he gave a moment ago — I realise that it is technical—of expenditure that is paid for out of fund in support of a capital scheme? Did he say t would count as revenue or as capital? How wo specification work in those circumstances?

Mr. Chope: I said that if rates were levied to f capital project, it might be argued that the ra income of a capital nature. That power would en Secretary of State to specify that all rate income revenue nature.

We propose to make specifications simply to doubts in such a way as to ensure that all new s rate fund revenue accounts will be in the form i authorities have kept their traditional revenue ac urge the Committee to reject these amendments.

We are also debating amendment No. 73 clause 6. Amendment No. 73 would prevent making specifications in relation to total expend 1984-85 to 1986-87 in Wales and for 1983-84 to in England and for 1987-88 in both countries. To the status quo, we need to make specifications years that will reflect directions we have made expenditure under the existing statutory provi 1986-87 and previous years. I therefore recom Committee to reject amendment No. 73.

Mr. Tony Banks: Would a local authority have to the courts for a decision taken by the Minist this subsection of clause 2?

Mr. Chope: This clause does not restrict the rig individuals to seek their remedies in the courts have always sought to do and regularly do. Norm courts decide that the Government have exerci discretion reasonably and properly.

New clause 6 would add CIPFA to tho consulted before a specification is made under cl That would be inappropriate. Although I reco professional expertise of CIPFA, that institute represent the local authorities that are affected grant. The authorities and their associations necessary expertise to respond to any consultati matter. Moreover, the consultation provisions in the Bill relating to specifications are in line with all the other consultation provisions relating to rate support grant.

We would not wish, nor is there any need, to change well tried precedents. I recommend that the Committee rejects new clause 6.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Allan Roberts: I beg to move amendment No. 54, in page 3, line 16, at end add—

'An item of account shall not be held to be contrary to law for the purpose of section 19 of the Local Government Finance Act 1982 by reason only of its being debited or credited to any account of a local authority where by virtue of this section it is required to be debited or credited to another account of that authority.'.

I shall speak briefly about amendment No. 54 as it relates back to a previous debate about what the Government are generally trying to do in this clause. This amendment is designed to give protection to local authorities that continue to make up their accounts in ways other than those prescribed in the Bill. As the Minister has already said that the legislation is not intended to do anything but prescribe what is already local authority practice, there is no reason why he should not accept this amendment, which writes his statement into the clause.

The provisions in the clause are mostly unnecessary, except for the validation of previous practice that has been deemed to be unlawful. As we have said, the provisions are necessary only because the Government now have, and want even more, detailed control of local authority expenditure.

8.45 pm

We want to know what is wrong with the present position—what is unlawful in items of local authority accounts and why the legislation is necessary. The law is clear, and deals with the misuse of money. Without this legislation, expenditure may have been unlawful because the local authority had no statutory power to incur it or because it was incurred as a result of an abuse of discretion. A particularly fine distinction in law has already been drawn between items of account that are on their face unlawful and those items that the council may lawfully incur, but which in a particular case might be tainted by illegality. An example is Beacham v. Metropolitan Auditor in 1976, where the Divisional court upheld the auditor's refusal to declare unlawful the expenditure incurred by an authority for demolishing some buildings, notwithstanding the argument that the demolition had required planning permission that had not been obtained. The court held that an item of account would be unlawful only if, by law, it should not have appeared in the accounts. That is an item of expenditure that the council has no power to incur.

The present position is that an item of account need not relate only to expenditure; it may be an item of either expenditure or income. An item of income might be unlawful because, for example, it came from an illegal source or it was for an illegal purpose.

If there are any "crooks"—the word used by the Conservative party chairman on television last night—in local government or in the City of London, they should be brought to book and prosecuted. Labour Members are totally against people behaving illegally and corruption in local government. The Labour party has more to lose from corruption and inefficiency in local government because it is the party that believes in local government, public expenditure and local authority public services. Therefore, we believe that such things should be adequately and forcibly dealt with.

We do not understand why the present law needs amending. What is wrong with the present definition of legality and illegality? We should like to put into the legislation protection for local councillors and local authority officers to carry on with the accounting practices in the way that they have done according to the current law of the land. As the Minister said previously that the Government's intention is to allow existing practices to continue, that must be in keeping with the thrust of that argument. I commend the amendment to the Minister.

Mr. Chope: I hope to persuade the Committee that the amendment is unnecessary. In answer to the point made by the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts)—if it is unnecessary there is no harm in including it—I must point out that if we were to include it, it would make things worse for local authorities. The amendment seeks to provide that where an item of account is debited or credited to an account contrary to the provisions of clause 2, it is not to be held contrary to law for the purposes of section 19 of the Local Government Finance Act 1982.

Section 19 of the 1982 Act is all about ultra vires expenditure — surcharge and disqualification. It deals with those circumstances where an authority has incurred expenditure without the power so to do, or which it has incurred through an abuse of its powers by acting unreasonably.

I am advised that reference to items of account that are contrary to law under section 19 would not include references to items of account that have simply been debited or credited to a different account from that to which statute provides they should have been debited. Accordingly, as I have said, the amendment is unnecessary and I recommend the Committee to reject it.

Were the amendment to be carried, it would cause problems because it would suggest that any other expenditure that should have been shown in some other account, such as an account under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972, would be contrary to law for the purpose of section 19 of the 1982 Act if not shown in that account. I hope that with that explanation the hon. Gentleman will withdraw the amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Allan Roberts: As none of the amendments has been accepted — and, therefore, the clause stands unamended—I urge the House to reject the clause. As I said in my opening remarks, still sounds ominous, despite the Minister's attempts to reassure us. The clause still contains major pieces of retrospective legislation that we believe to be unnecessary. It introduces new provisions as well as validating past practices. It still includes the provision of extra powers that the Secretary of State will be able to exercise dictatorially without the scrutiny of Parliament and without consulting local authorities through their associations or individually.

"Rate fund revenue accounts: further provisions"

These powers are being given to the Secretary of State in a clause that we consider to be bad legislation. This proposed legislation seeks to enshrine into law more powers to enable the Government to be involved in the detailed running of local authorities' internal affairs and internal accounting procedures. The clause is opposed by Labour in local government, by alliance councillors, independent councillors and, even more significant for the Government, by Conservative councillors and those who help the Conservative party in local government through their local authority housing associations.

Beyond that, the clause is opposed by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy and by others who are involved professionally in dealing with local authority accounts. In short, it is bad legislation. It flows from previous pieces of bad legislation, and this is the 13th Local Government Finance Bill that the Government have introduced. At each stage, they have assured us that their purpose is to clarify the law in protecting local government and simplifying procedures for it. At each stage, however, the law has become less clear, more complicated, more bureaucratic and more centralist. Clause 2 is no exception to that process.

We tried to amend the clause in a way that would have prevented the need to vote against it. Our amendments sought to give more rights and freedoms to local democratically elected councils. We sought to amend it in a way that would prevent state interference with one of Britain's finest democratic institutions — local government. Our intention was to amend it in a way that would make retrospection unnecessary. If our amendments had been accepted, it would not have been necessary for Ministers to say, "We are seeking to set out in legislation the good practices that local government already observes." Local government follows those practices and has done so for many years.

If these good practices exist, why do we need to introduce bureaucratic legislation on to the statute book? Unfortunately, it is necessary to take that course because the Government find themselves in a mess through their own desire to interfere. They wish to cut services and to cause local authorities to make their employees redundant. The Government find themselves in a mess because of their attempt to reduce services and public expenditure through cutting local authority expenditure. They have had to erect a panoply of legislation to enable them to interfere.

The clause will not clarify the issue, nor will it simplify it. If it becomes part of an Act, it will prove to be as unworkable as every other piece of local government legislation that the Government have introduced. Every piece of their previous legislation has been circumvented because of local government's ingenuity. As that has happened at every stage, the Government have introduced another Bill, but local government chief officers and treasurers have been able legally to defend jobs and services in their areas. They have circumvented previous legislation and they will circumvent the Bill. Further legislation will be needed, especially as the Bill has been hurried and is ill thought out. It is not understood even by the Secretary of State for the Environment, let alone by local government. I hope that the Committee will reject the clause.

Mr. Chope: I hope that the Committee will allow clause 2 to remain in the Bill. It is an important clause. I note that the Opposition did not have the courage of their convictions to call a Division on any of their ame Perhaps they were not quite sure whether any of t adequate.

Mr. Allan Roberts: If we receive challenges of we shall vote on every amendment. We are well a the Government have a majority, that the Go Whips are on and that the payroll vote is in the Commons. By voting against the clause standin the Bill, we are dividing on a matter of principle hoped that by reasoned argument we would per Government to accept some of our amendment

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend the Chancel Duchy of Lancaster has pointed out to perhaps——

Mr. Walter Harrison (Wakefield): On a point Mr. Walker. If the Minister wishes to chall Opposition, we can divide on all our amendm every Government amendment. The ability to d illustrated in 1971, and that illustration can be If the Minister provokes the Opposition, he will irrespective of what the Opposition Front Bench the Minister know that.

Mr. Chope: I would not wish to pick an argun someone who has had the experience of Opposition Deputy Chief Whip. I am advised by hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lanca perhaps the Opposition have not voted amendments to clause 2 because they do not h troops here. I do not know whether there is any that piece of advice.

The clause, along with clause 1, introduces int the concept of the rate fund revenue account relevant and total expenditure can be defined i and the new statutory definition is that which in has been adopted since 1981.

Clause 2 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3

Meaning of local authorities expenditure

Dr. Boyson: I beg to move amendment No. 58, in page 3, line 19, leave out from 'year' to end of line 20 and insert—

'(a) reduced by the aggregate of the credit items of account for the year, and

(b) adjusted by making such additions or subtractions (or both) as are specified in respect of the year concerned by the Secretary of State.'.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Paul Dean): With this amendment it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 59 to 63, 65 to 67, 74, 89, 150 and 152.

Dr. Boyson: These are amendments to the power of my right hon. Friend to make specifications in relation to relevant expenditure. They bring this power into line with the power to make specifications on total expenditure in clause 3(7).

It may assist the Committee if I indicate how we intend to use this power of specification. First, my right hon. Friend intends to make specifications so that relevant expenditure in future will be in essence the same as it has been taken to be in the past. That is, relevant expenditure will be broadly the net expenditure of an authority, excluding certain items such as mandatory student grants which are financed by specific and supplementary grants, rate support grants, rate or precept income, and balances.

Secondly, we intend that specifications should provide that, when an item of account has been entered in the rate fund revenue account contrary to proper practice applicable to that account, it is excluded from relevant expenditure. The amendments are necessary to deal with that latter point.

These matters have not arisen with the existing statutory specification in the 1980 Act because the statute does not refer to accounts or accounting practices although, in practice, we have operated as if it did.

Under our current approach, if we considered that total expenditure, and hence relevant expenditure, which authorities submitted to us improperly omi account, or improperly contained such an i adjust the submitted figures after giving th opportunity to comment on what we prop

Thirdly, we intend to make specification authority includes in its rate fund rev transactions that involve putting more mon funds, and if there is no specific liability aga money is being provided — what we co deficit financing of special funds—the tra be excluded from relevant expenditure ar expenditure.

If we had not been advised that our ger to total and relevant expenditure was incor would have sought to exclude such transact figures of expenditure submitted by authori our normal practice of dealing with figures to my right hon. Friend to be improperly

Under the powers that we are now takin deal with all such situations by means of should add that, before making specificati hon. Friend will consider carefully all of t tions that he receives and consult when he do so. To make specifications here, his po to be exercised in accordance with principle applied to all local authorities.

Any decision to make a specification mu in accordance with general and admi principles, so the Secretary of State unreasonable decisions. His decisions will to the courts.

Mr. John Fraser: The central objection to that Parliament is seeking the power to should or should not go in or out of a loc account, as we have to concede that Par powers from time to time to regulate th accounts. I have referred frequently to th Acts. There is no disagreement in that objection is that the power to determine w omitted from or included in a local autho account is to be specified by the Secretary Minister made no secret of that. However things which I welcome.

First, the Minister said that, when mak tions, he would consider representations relevant authority. I take it that he wil assurance that, when he makes any genera about what should be included in or omitte authority's account, he will consider the repr local authorities generally, as expressed by l associations. It would be helpful if the Min to give an assurance that general represent received in addition to the representations th referred to.

The second assurance that the Minister ha the principles on which the specifications ar be general, and will not differentiate authorities. We understand that future dec challengeable in the courts. I am sure that i chose to discriminate between one authority the courts would not be slow to interve principles of administrative law. It will perhaps the Minister will reply construct Minister will accept an amendment on Repo incorporate the obligation to consult to whic adverted. If he is willing to do that, it will go at least some way towards assuring local authorities that they will be consulted about these matters and will not be dealt with differentially.

9.15 pm

Mr. Dobson: I should be grateful if the Minister will answer some questions arising from the probing Opposition amendments. I should like clarification from the Minister, particularly in view of his earlier interest in education, of the status of payments made and income received by education authorities when they provide education for pupils from other areas. Will the Minister give us some information about the income that the Inner London education authority receives from, say, the London borough of Barnet, which is represented by the Prime Minister? In 1986, the parents of 780 children so recognised the superiority of the education provided by the Inner London education authority that they sent their children from Barnet to Inner London education authority schools. Even allowing for those who go the other way, there is a net inflow of 332 children from Barnet schools into ILEA schools. Is that income reckonable and does it fall within clause 3 as a credit item?

If the Minister thinks that I singled out the borough that the Prime Minister claims to represent, where parents overwhelmingly voted with their children's feet to get a better education from the Inner London education authority, he might prefer to look at the example of the London borough of Brent, part of which he claims to represent. Before any of the Minister's more ignorant hon. Friends suggest that the London borough of Brent was Labour-controlled, I remind the Minister that, in 1985, when the London borough of Brent was Tory-controlled, no fewer than 1,924 children from the London borough of Brent were sent by their parents to Inner London education authority schools because they recognised the superiority of the service that the Inner London education authority was able to offer at that time.

I shall be grateful if the Minister will tell us exactly what will happen to the income that will accrue to the Inner London education authority in those circumstances. I hope that he will persuade one or two of his colleagues, should any actually turn up for the debate, to recognise that parents, particularly those in the outer London boroughs and the overwhelming majority living on the borders, recognise the superiority of the service provided by the Inner London education authority, despite the adverse publicity that he, his hon. Friend, the London Evening Standard and other obnoxious journals constantly pump forth.

Mr. Hancock: I should like the Minister to clarify the point raised by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on Government amendment No. 58. This set of Government amendments gives the Secretary of State enormous powers. I believe that local government is worried about the proposed change. The Bill as it stands allows the Secretary of State to exempt items from the expenditure of a local authority, if he wishes. These provisions allow him to add items, if he wishes.

Many local authorities, for various reasons, run reserve funds which come within the categories covered by schedule 1. It could be a vehicle reserve fund, in which the local authority saves money to buy new vehicles, or a general reserve fund. My local authority of Portsmout has a reserve fund. It would be worried if a Secretary State had the discretion in one year to add its reserve fun to or exempt it from the general way in which i expenditure is reckoned for rate support grant in subsequent year.

Will local authorities be treated differently? Many ho Members and I fully accept the Government's fear of th creative accounting that has taken place. Many peop believe that this will lead to problems when loc authorities are finally brought to book and made account in real terms. Many local authorities are afra that items over which they have little control will be adde to or exempted from their accounts. They may have gre difficulty, therefore, in operating their budget for th coming year. Will the Secretary of State have th discretion to pick on a particular local authority and p it in this category?

I should be afraid if the Committee supported th Government's amendments. Many questions arise as what can and what cannot be covered. I am concerne about the discretionary power being wheeled in, somewh like a guillotine, whenever it suits the political climate. I read the legislation correctly, it could lead to th Secretary of State inflicting a mini-budget on a loc authority half-way through the year and suddenly addi an item that had not previously been included. That mu send shivers down the spines of many local treasurers, not local councillors. The legislation gives enormo powers to the Secretary of State and we are entitled to full explanation of how it will operate and exactly what will cover.

Dr. Boyson: I shall try to deal as adequately as I ca with the important questions that have been raised on th technical matter. If I cannot deal with all the questions, shall write to the hon. Members concerned.

On the point raised by the hon. Member for Norwoo (Mr. Fraser), I give the commitment that the loc authority associations will be seen. Further, I can say th decisions will be challengeable in the courts. I therefo give affirmative answers on those two points.

If I could have the attention of the hon. Member f Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), I shall answer h points.

Mr. Dobson: I hang on the hon. Gentleman's eve word.

Dr. Boyson: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I tru that he is still doing so when I have finished speaki about the matter which he raised.

There is much movement of children between o authority area and another in London. I do not want make a party point, but I must say that the movement children out of Brent has increased greatly. For two a a half years the Conservative party had control over Bre with the Liberal party. But the movement out of Brent h occurred before then. Next week, I shall find out t movement from ILEA to Brent and Barnet. I trust tha shall be able to get the figures to send them to the ho Member for Holborn and St. Pancras. I know that he a seeker after truth.

Mr. Dobson: On the assumption that the hon. Doct is a seeker after the truth, why did only 1,783 come in

[Mr. Dobson]

ILEA schools in 1982 and why did the number increase to 1,924 after the Conservatives and the alliance had been in charge in Brent for two years?

Dr. Boyson: As I said to the hon. Gentleman, I shall look at the figures. I have not the slightest doubt that those figures are correct. However, I shall consider them.

The hon. Gentleman must remember that ILEA schools were built up to a high standard. I served as a headmaster in ILEA schools for 14 years. Therefore, I can see both sides of the issue. However, the hon. Gentleman would probably not have appointed me had I applied when he was the chairman of the governors. My school was the most over-subscribed in London, and still has the longest waiting list in London. Therefore, I am aware of the movement between schools.

I do not doubt the hon. Gentleman's word when he speaks about education, but I shall consider the figures and pass them on to him because I know that he would like to have them, and so would I.

This year, 25·6 per cent. of children in Brent are going to independent schools or to county schools elsewhere in London. That is a very large figure and it is four times the average for London.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about the status of the recoupment passing from one authority to another. I must advise the hon. Member that in 1980 I took a Bill through its Committee stage which gave parents more choice of schools and gave them the right to cross boundaries. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman should worship at my shrine. The ingratitude of the hon. Gentleman is like a charcoal biscuit—it is very difficult to absorb. I do not expect the hon. Gentleman to join my party immediately although, obviously, he should be influenced by that fact.

The expenditure on recoupment payments between Brent and ILEA, or between ILEA and any of the London education authorities, would come from the rates fund revenue account for Brent and it would be income for ILEA. That is the way in which the payments would move between the two bodies. The expenditure would come out of the rate fund revenue account for Brent and would be counted as income for ILEA. As I have said, there is much movement in London between one authority and another.

A moment ago I knew the answer to question raised by the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock), but it has just slipped my memory for the moment. I shall include it in one of my later answers to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hancock: The question referred to the reserve funds operated by many local authorities, and whether those funds could and would be brought in and out at the Minister's discretion, and how those reserve funds would be allowed to operate in those local authorities in years to come and whether that discretion would be reflected across the board or whether individual local authorities would be picked out.

Dr. Boyson: I presume that that would apply to all authorities and it would actually count as a special fund. Obviously, we have had to legislate identically for all authorities. The legislation is difficult enough now without discriminating between one local authority and another.

Mr. Hancock: The way in which the provision is worded at present, especially with amendment No. 74, gives, if I am reading it correctly, the M ability, if he so desires, to say, for exam city council, "You must include, in thi expenditure any reserve fund that However, at the same time, if I am rea and the amendment correctly, he could push that same commitment on other lo must watch that ability to choose a consider whether it covers, for exampl that many local authorities operate.

Dr. Boyson: The reserve funds wi funds. I shall check and write to the ho I can give him a full reply on the questio universal. That is a serious questio authorities throughout the country.

Mr. John Fraser: The Minister gave there would be general consultation w well as with individual authorities, and that. However, it is by no means un obligation for the Government to con statute.

Apart from our fundamental object hon. Friends and I believe that the pow over which Parliament should have son therefore it is a matter that, at least, sh by statutory instrument so that when t forward with a set of specifications he w consent of the House of Commons and shall table an amendment that will dea very least, will the Minister accep amendment to place a statutory d Government at least to consult specification? May we have an assur amendment, if tabled, would be accept

Dr. Boyson: As I said to the hon. Ge Secretary of State will consult local as specification is answerable to the cour commitment to the hon. Gentleman t any amendment. We shall look at all th Report, as we are doing now. I can say at this stage.

Mr. Fraser: We were invited to amendment when the Minister spoke e divide on every amendment and I do no the Committee to divide on this. How mean that we are simply allowing this t want to make some progress. I hop permission, Sir Paul, we will have a deb part and we shall express our diss appropriate way when we reach that p

Question accordingly agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 59, in page 3, line 23, leave out 'or parts of items'.

No. 60, in page 3, line 27, leave out 'or parts of items'.

No. 61, in page 3, line 30, leave out or parts of items'.

No. 62, in page 3, line 33, at end insert 'and'.

No. 63, in page 3, line 36, leave out from 'courses)' to end of line 38.

No. 65, in page 3, line 40, leave out 'or parts of items'.

No. 66, in page 3, line 41, at end insert 'and'.

No. 67, in page 3, line 43, leave out from 'authority' to end of line 46.—[Dr. Boyson.]

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): I beg to move amendment No. 68, in page 4, line 1, leave out subsection (6).

The amendment seeks to delete subsection (6). It appears to be another example of the Secretary of State building legal safeguards and judge-proofing into the Bill. It is surprising that the Secretary of State has found it necessary to include this catch-all subsection. He has had at least three months in which to draft the legislation.

Clause 3 defines what is meant by local authorities' expenditure for the purpose of part VI of the 1980 Act's support grant. It is acceptable to us, so far as it goes, subject to the safeguards that we are trying to build into clause 3. However, clause 3(6) says:

"Subsection (1) . . . shall have effect subject to any enactment (whenever passed)".

Will the Minister explain what this phrase means and tell the Committee what was the Government's intention in including this phrase? Is it retrospective?

Will the Minister also list the Acts to which the phrase refers? The Committee is being asked to give a blank cheque to the Secretary of State. How are hon. Members to know whether the redefinition of "relevant expenditure" is appropriate in the context of other enactments? Does the Secretary of State know what they are? If so, will he list them, or is this a manifestation of legal paranoia?

9.45 pm

Dr. Boyson: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) for his comments. This is a technical matter and I shall answer as best I can about what this amendment would do and why we are resisting it. The amendment would mean that the definition of relevant expenditure in the Bill would exclude certain items that we do not want excluded. It would delete clause 3(6) which provides that the definition of relevant expenditure is "subject to any enactment (whenever passed) having the effect that anything is or is not to be treated . . . as relevant expenditure".

An example of such an enactment is the Social Security and Housing Benefit Act 1982, which provides that if an order is made — and one has been made — certain contributions to the housing revenue account are not to be treated as relevant expenditure. It is on this basis that our current practices on rate support grant have been operated. The effect of the amendment would be that in any rate support grant reports and supplementary reports made after the passing of the Bill those contributions would no longer be excluded from relevant expenditure.

It is right that the provisions which provide that certain items are not part of relevant expenditure should continue to have effect. I need hardly remind the Committee again that the purpose of the Bill is to enable us to continue current practice and, as far as possible, clause 3 and the rest of the Bill will ensure a continuance of current practice. I hope that the Opposition will not press the amendment to a vote, because it would undermine part or all of clause 3.

Mr. Hancock: This amendment is a challenge to the Minister because he must tell the Committee what it means. Let me put myself in the position of a local government treasurer reading this legislation and being asked by his members to explain what it means. What does this cover and what does it not cover? It is not good enough for us glibly to push aside an amendment which is not only a probing amendment but one which means something. It means that in future the Government will have to spell out exactly what they mean by it. It is not good enough for us to be told time and time again that these matters will be open to challenge in the courts. That is not a fair basis upon which local government should have to work in the next 12 months after the Bill receives Royal Assent.

We need specific answers to those points. I am sure that with the best will in the world the Minister will say that in time he can give those answers. I look forward to that time and to the correspondence. This debate is sparsely attended, but there is a wider audience outside which has some enthusiasm for local government expenditure. Such enthusiasm is hard to engender in the Committee, but in the months ahead many people will have a difficult time if we do not get some clarification of exactly what is meant by the Minister's statements.

I am sure that Hansard will be read by those treasurers and councillors who care about what is happening to local government finance. They will wonder what the Minister meant in his reply to the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes), who moved the amendment. The Minister must spell out what is covered and what is not. What areas of expenditure does he want to see included but which are not specifically mentioned in the Bill? May we please have answers to those questions?

Dr. Boyson: I shall reply briefly to the questions asked by the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock). I shall have to be careful with the words because all these words mean something and have to be interpreted. [Interruption.] I try to interpret them for myself at the same time as I interpret them for the Committee and five minutes later I wonder if I have. I should prefer to write to the hon. Member about this, because I do not want to be tied to what I say is the interpretation. For example, I have written down for my own reference the definitions for net expenditure and total expenditure. I have written that net expenditure is, first, from the rate support grant, secondly, from the rate and precept income, thirdly, from balances and, fourthly, from specific and supplementary grants. Total expenditure, which one would expect to be more, is all these without specific and supplementary grants. Having understood that, I think that I had better be careful on the other definitions.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Boyes: I beg to move amendment No. 69, in page 4, line 12, leave out paragraph (b).

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this amendment it will be convenient also to take amendment No. 70, in page 4, line 12, leave out from 'by' to end of line and insert "the addition or subtraction of such descriptions of expenditure or receipts."

Mr. Boyes: Clause 3(7) allows the Secretary of State to adjust the definition of total expenditure given in the Bill by adding or subtracting items in any future year. The definitions of relevant and total expenditure form the basis of the legal difficulty currently facing the Government in their rate support grant and Rates Act policy. That power will give the Secretary of State a substantial measure of control in the future to affect the basis of local authority spending policies.

In his statement to the House on 16 December 1986, the Secretary of State said:

"The Bill is designed to make no changes in policy, but as far as possible to apply existing policy within a tight timetable."—[Official Report, 16 December 1986; Vol. 107, col. 1051.]

In fact, the Minister is taking several opportunities in the Bill to augment his powers, as in this case. Clause 3(7)(b) contains unspecific and sweeping powers for the Secretary of State to reduce or increase an authority's total expenditure, which is used to calculate its entitlement to grant. There is no sign of how the power will be used or by what criteria that use will be governed. Given that it may be used arbitrarily to deprive local authorities of millions of pounds, it is essential that Parliament retains an ability to scrutinise the use of the power rather than leaving such general powers in the hands of the Executive. Our amendment will delete paragraph (b), which includes these extra powers.

Dr. Boyson: Section 56 (8) of the 1980 Act provides that total expenditure is relevant expenditure reduced by the amount of specific and supplementary grants, and adjusted by the addition or subtraction of such descriptions of expenditure or receipt that the Secretary of State may direct. Directions were made under this power for each of the years 1983-84 to 1986-87. It is intended to make specifications under clause 3(7)(b) which broadly will reflect the directions made in the past.

The effect of amendment No. 69 is that total expenditure will be relevant expenditure reduced by the amount of specific and supplementary grants. Total expenditure will not therefore be the same as in the past. The basis of the Bill is to put in definitions that will stand up that we presumed from 1980 to 1986 were the definitions on which so much local government financing went ahead.

Amendment No. 70 will replace the power to make specifications in clause 3(7)(b) with a power in the same terms as the present power in section 56 (8) of the 1980 Act. The purpose of the amendment is to find out why the terms of the power have been changed. The reasons are that the existing power allows adjustment to be made only in respect of expenditure—that is, expenditure incurred in respect of third parties — and receipts which are, income from third parties.

Some of the adjustments made in the past were not, or might not, be expenditure or receipts. I am sure that the Committee is following this very carefully. Clearly, the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) is. For example, directions were made so that discounts for prompt payments of rates should be added—something that has been discontinued in most parts of Britain, but we used to have discounts for rates if they were paid by a certain time.

It is only arguable that that is expenditure. Directions were also made that certain reductions in block grant as a result of regulations under schedule 10 of the 1980 Act —that is, the Act on educational pooling—should be added. But those reductions in block grant were neither expenditure nor receipts. Unless the power is in the terms of that in clause 3(7)(b), it will not be possible to reproduce what has been the practice for 1983-84 to 1986-87 in the future. One will realise what a disaster that would be for the country.

Mr. Pike: By his comments the Minister showed that there might be a case for not pressing the amendment. However, rather than giving one example, he needed to give more details about why it was essential that the clause should not be amended.

On amendments Nos. 69 and 70 the Minister said that the Government's intention is, as far as possible, to try to maintain the status quo in all respects. However, we would argue that that is not the case. Burnley borough council, on which I used to serve, still gives 2·5 per cent. discount for the prompt payment of rates. That is highly successful, although whether it is worthwhile is considered every year by the council when it fixes the annual rate. The council must calculate how much discount it will give and provide extra income to cover that. The prompt payment of rates means that it can save on interest payments and gain income from investing money for a short period.

However, I doubt whether clause 3(7)(b) means exactly what the Minister says it does. If it really does mean what the Minister is saying, I could accept the logic of leaving it as it is, although, obviously, we do not like many of the provisions in the Bill.

I would argue that the clause gives the Secretary of State scope beyond what the Minister was saying and that is the danger. If the Minister is sincere in what he has just said, and if the Secretary of State is also sincere—he is in the Chamber—they should tell the House tonight that they are prepared to amend the clause on Report in order to clarify it because it can be interpreted in a different way.

I strongly believe that it is not what a Minister says, whether in Committee upstairs or on the Floor of the House, that makes the law; it is the Bill as it is written which will have to be interpreted in the courts. Even if we are prepared to be generous to the present Secretary of State, another Secretary of State could use this in a different way at a later stage.

In all seriousness, if the Minister really believes what he said to us, let him prove his good faith by saying that the Government are prepared to look at this again and return on Report with something which will make it clear that what he said is what the clause actually means. At the moment, I believe that it can be interpreted in a different way and others will also believe that. If that is the case, it is not acceptable. I hope that the Minister will be prepared to look at the clause in that spirit and say that the Government are prepared to think again.

Dr. Boyson: I am grateful for the speech of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike). I am glad to know that the 2·5 per cent. discount is still paid in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. I come from the next valley, the Rossendale valley, and a 2·5 per cent. discount was always paid there. I never understand why authorities in London do not have discounts to get their money in more quickly. If there is a north-south divide, it seems to be that discounts are paid in the north but not in the south.

This week we in the Government have been blamed for the number of amendments that we have put down because of the speed with which we have had to bring this Bill before the House. If we started putting down more amendments on the suggestion of the hon. Member for Burnely, honest as I am sure he is in the desire for further clarification, we would have to be careful what we did.

We shall consider what the hon. Gentleman said and what is contained in the clause. If it is then our conviction that the amendments can be expressed more clearly and will stand up in the courts——

Question accordingly agreed to.

Local Government Finance Bill

Again considered in Committee.

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Dr. Boyson: In conclusion, I recommend to my hon. Friends that we vote against this amendment and keep the clause as it is.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment made: No. 74, in page 4, line 17, leave out from 'subsection' to end of line 18 and insert—

'(1) or (7) above shall be calculated; and an addition or substraction specified under subsection (1) or (7) above may or may not represent an item of account debited or credited to the authority's rate fund revenue account for the year.'.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Mr. Meadowcroft: I beg to move amendment No. 77, in page 4, line 23, leave out '(b) or (c)'.

I hope that the amendment's import becomes clear. If the wording is not exactly correct it must be remembered that we do not have the great parliamentary draftsmen at our disposal. I am sure that wording could be corrected in another place if we convince the Committee, by our eloquence, to accept the principle.

The crucial point concerns the amounts which are available under central funding through grants to local government and which are constrained by the provisions in the clause that we seek to amend. The amendment seeks to take out the provision for the transport supplementary grant — to take out subsection (b) or (c) in section 54(2) of the 1980 Local Government, Planning and Land Act. That would give local government some £7 million of transport supplementary grant and national parks supplementary grant.

Since the advent of deregulation, the transport problems, especially in urban areas, have been more acute. This is of no surprise to many hon. Members. Local government has to subsidise transport to ensure a proper transport system is available but providing that service has become a serious problem because of lack of resources. I hope, therefore, that the Government will recognise the problem and recognise that this sum of money should go back into the amount for local government. We will then have some extra help, small though it may be, to deal with local government problems.

10.15 pm

Dr. Boyson: The amendment would mean that relevant expenditure would be a figure net of transport supplementary grant and national parks supplementary grant unless my right hon. Friend makes specifications to avoid that. According to current practice, relevant expenditure is not a figure net of these supplementary grants. We wish that to continue. Therefore, the amendment serves no purpose and I recommend hon. Members to resist it in spite of the oratory of the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) which I found slightly persuasive if I could have been persuaded.

Question proposed, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Boyes: Clause 3 is intended to give the Minister effective power to rewrite the definitions when it suits him. New powers may be given to the Minister in subsections (4)(c), (5)(c), (7)(b) and (8). He may adjust the basis of calculation of debit and credit items of account; he may adjust up or down the basis of calculation of total expenditure for any local authority; he may specify the manner of calculation of total expenditure and the factors to be taken into account. For practical purposes, the Secretary of State will gain control of local authority expenditure calculations and definitions with the clear intention of using the power to restrict spending. There is no limitation in the Bill on the manner of calculation or factors which may be relevant. The power is not subject to parliamentary scrutiny and there is no requirement to consult affected parties, despite the fact that large amounts could be involved. It is normal practice in relation to grant matters to consult at least the local authority associations. Finally, I agree with the remarks of the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) and with the remarks that I made myself on other amendments which demonstrate that certain clauses are completely incomprehensible to the people who have to administer local government finance.

Dr. Boyson: I must not be tempted by the last point made by the hon. Gentleman. I was glad to hear that he still agrees with himself and with what he said on earlier amendments, which shows consistency that all of us should follow. Certainly I try to be consistent.

The clause defines for the year 1987-88 and subsequent years the relevant expenditure and total expenditure of local authorities for the purposes of part VI of the 1980 Act. The clause is a key provision in providing a new statutory definition of relevant and total expenditure and follows the practice adopted since 1981. So once again we are trying to continue a practice that we believe should remain.

The clause provides a definition which refers to it of account debited or credited to the rate fund reve account set up by clauses 1 and 2. Those items of acco include as debit items transfers from the rate fund reve account to special funds such as reserve funds, and credit items transfers to the rate fund revenue acco from special funds. In short, the clause is the key to set up in statute the practical method of calculating relev and total expenditure which we have been operating si 1981. The definitions in the Bill will validate them for past, and also, we trust, for the future.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 3, as amended, ordered to stand part of the

Clause 4

VALIDATION FOR PAST AND GENERAL PROVISION FOR FUTURE

Dr. Boyson: I beg to move amendment No. 79, in page 4, line 43, leave out from first 'of' to end of line and insert 'an amount of block grant payable'.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to consider Government amendments Nos. 90 and 187.

Dr. Boyson: These are technical amendments to the provisions dealing with the calculation of relevant and total expenditure for certain previous years. They are necessary if we are to be able to make the conclusive calculations of block grant payable and further supplementary reports for years as intended.

For England, supplementary reports intended to be the final ones have been made for 1981-82 and for 1982-83. All that is intended for the future for those years it to make a conclusive calculation of block grant payable to each authority. Clause 4 provides for that to be done. For other previous years for England, further supplementary reports are intended—clauses 4 and 5 provide for that.

When conclusive calculations for supplementary reports are made for years before 1986-87, the authorities to be covered by the calculations and reports include the metropolitan county councils and the Greater London council.

The conclusive calculations for 1981-82 and for 1982-83 will simply confirm entitlements that have already been notified to authorities, but if, as a result of further reports, the grant entitlement of those authorities is different from the grant that has already been paid, any adjustment will be made with the appropriate residuary body in accordance with the Local Government Act 1985. The effect of any adjustment will thus be shared among the district councils in a metropolitan county area or among the boroughs in London.

The amendments will enable clauses 4 and 5 to cater for the GLC for years before 1986-87. I know that there are hon. Members who served on that council. Without the amendments, we could not proceed as we intend, and the status quo would not be maintained. I commend the amendments to the Committee.

Mr. John Fraser: If I have understood the Minister correctly, there could be a retrospective change in the accounts of the GLC which would affect local authorities that have no control whatever over the decisions that have been made. One cannot possibly attribute to Southwark, Lambeth, Merton or Sutton the consequences of decisions made by the GLC.

The very least that one ought to ask is that the Minister should give assurances that, if he is thinking of making any substantial changes retrospectively in the construction of the GLC's accounts, he will consult the London authorities about the consequences of those decisions, as they could be adversely affected by decisions in which they play no part.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the Minister explain how he would intend to do what he has just outlined with regard to any interpretation of the GLC's accounts? I do not know how it will be done. I do not know where all the information about the GLC's accounts is held. I assume that the Department of the Environment has a fairly shrewd idea what went on in the days of the GLC. I hasten to add that there was nothing improper.

The London residuary body is still in the process of winding up the affairs of the GLC's various committees but, I understand, is making fairly slow progress. I listened to what the Minister said, but I am not sure how he would obtain the information with which to do what he says he would do. I should be most grateful if the Minister could assist me in that respect.

Dr. Boyson: The Government amendments make any required action possible. I cannot this evening refer to the details of that action. I should not like to delay the Committee with the details at this late hour. They may be more difficult to understand than some of the amendments. The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) raised an interesting point. The hon. Gentleman often raises interesting points. I am quite prepared to see the hon. Gentleman or to write to him about the details. There is no question of changing our re-interpretation of the GLC accounts. The information about the GLC expenditure is submitted by the London residuary body. I know that the hon. Gentleman is concerned about the matter. I certainly did not wish to disturb his sleep this evening.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. Straw: The Committee has caught me on the hop. I shall endeavour to follow in the rhetorical footsteps of the Minister. I beg to move amendment No. 80, in page 4, line 44, leave out subsection (5).

Subsection 5 states:

"In relation to any intermediate year—

(a) after the passing of this Act relevant and total expenditure of a local authority shall be calculated for the purposes of Part VI of the 1980 Act in accordance with section 5 below, and

(b) anything done (including an adjustment made) after the passing of this Act for those purposes shall, to the extent that it involves relevant or total expenditure of a local authority, be done by reference to expenditure so calculated."

In a moment we shall have an opportunity to debate the wider issues raised by the clause. The Opposition moved this amendment to get an explanation from the Minister about the operation of the subsection.

Dr. Boyson: I shall attempt to give an explanation to the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) about why we reject this clause. It will damage the Bill. I am sorry, we must not reject the clause.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Why not?

Dr. Boyson: I was looking forward to the debate. The hon. Lady may participate in it. We have not heard the hon. Lady's voice today in the stand part debate. With some of these figures, she may be thinking of standing fast.

The amendment will have the effect that relevant and total expenditure for the so-called intermediate years—that is the years 1983-84 to 1986-87 in England and 1984-85 to 1986-87 in Wales—could not be calculated for any of the purposes for which such figures of expenditure will be needed after the passage of the Bill. Thus, the amendment will prevent my right hon. Friend from making any further supplementary reports for these years. They could not continue to act in the way intended and as local government expects.

In short, the amendment would prevent us from achieving our aim of maintaining the status quo. Even Labour Members, I hope, would not wish us to depart from that. I recommend that the Committee reject the amendment. Basically, in this clause we are following, as far as one can, preceding practice.

Ms. Clare Short: We are constantly told that the Bill is about validating the past. The Minister tells us that, if the amendment were passed, the Government could not interfere with settlements for 1984-85. That is a long time ago. I am surprised that the Government need take powers back that far. Will the Minister explain more thoroughly, rather than just reading from the brief, exactly what the effect would be if the amendment were passed?

10.30 pm

Dr. Boyson: I shall answer the hon. Lady without reading the brief. Let me put it on the record so that lawyers do not need to fight about the next definition.

Supplementary reports are made. Each year the Government give a rate support grant settlement to each authority and it then knows what it will receive. But, as the year passes, the data change — population, rateable values, the number of children under five, the number of old people, and so on — and there is continuing updating, so that, by the end of the year, the position of the 485 local authorities has changed. A reassessment occurs from time to time, including one of expenditure.

I have referred to the intermediate years of 1984-85 to 1986-87, the present year. Supplementary reports are required to let the local authorities know the exact position. We cannot obtain those supplementary reports until we get the legislation and our definitions right. Every Government have used supplementary reports from previous years so that they continually bring up to date the amount of money that goes to each local authority.

Amendment negatived.

Question proposed, That the clause, as amended stand part of the Bill.

Dr. Boyson: Clause 4 validates all those things done by the Secretary of State for rate support grant purposes under the provisions described in clause 4(2). It also provides that for those years for which rate support grant supplementary reports have been made which are intended to be final, the conclusive calculations of block grant are to be made on the basis of the supplementary reports and the information that the Secretary of State took into account in making them. The clause provides that the future decisions on supplementary reports for 1983-84, for 1984-85, and for 1985-86, which do not yet exist, and for 1986-87 shall be taken in line with the provisions of clause 5.

Clause 5, when we come to it, provides that expenditure shall be defined for those years in the same way as for 1987-88. The supplementary reports will contain a definition of total and relevant expenditure and all the other information, just as is being done for the 1987-88 report.

Mr. Tony Banks: The Minister will be aware that the London borough of Newham has seen his Department a number of times to try to do something about the problems that were first encountered through the creation of special funds in the 1982-83 accounts which, were disallowed by the Department of the Envi Those contributions were neglected in the accounts and, due to additional grant penal resulted in a deficit of about £4 million. I coul some detail about Newham's current position foll position in 1982-83 and the creation of speci However, it has been reflected since then i settlements we have had. I should like to know there is still a chance for Newham's case to be before the Bill becomes an Act. Is there any point to see the Minister yet again in order to explain N case and to see whether we can get some redress now saying that with the passage of the cla eventually the Act, we might as well forget a problems that arose in 1982-83 and that we have r either in law or by appeal to the Minister?

Dr. Boyson: I understand why the hon. G raised that issue, which is a source of concern for However, that is involved in schedule 2 and I wou to deal with it then. I am aware of the hon. Ge point.

Mr. Spearing: I appreciate what the Minister are to deal with amendment No. 132, on schedu understand it, the Minister is saying that any ad will have to be taken account of within the fo schedule 2 and cannot be in any way adjusted u terms of clause 4 because it is a rigid clause. Minister confirm that? That is, in effect, what he I would like him to be explicit.

Dr. Boyson: The hon. Gentleman is correct: it under schedule 2. If there is any disagreement nothing to stop the hon. Gentleman from ta amendment on this matter. However, as it stands under schedule 2.

Mr. Straw: As the Minister has explained, validates past Acts and makes general provisior future. It seeks to clear up the mess of the past se of rate support grant and local government regimes which the Government have created. D course of the debates we have had statements Minister and the Secretary of State trying to dis responsibility for the 1980 Act, and every amen since then. We have had one every year. It is typi Government that whenever anything goes wr pretend that somehow they had nothing to do w

The financial regime of local authorities is ba the 1980 Act. I am glad to see the hon. Me Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) agreeing with that. Tha the creation of the right hon. It was the Opposition who opposed that Act on the groun was impractical, and incomprehensible and woul serious problems for local authorities. I hope that the Minister and the Secretary of St some humility. They keep coming to the Disp saying that they dislike the present local financial regime. That may be the case but why vote for it and why do they, no doubt, support Government? We are seeing a latter-day conversion. What guarantee do we have that the new system will be any better than the present system?

Our real concern about clause 4 is not that it seeks to validate past Acts, which people had thought were valid anyway, but about the way in which it seeks to do that, especially, as we discussed under the group of amendments including No. 2A, the fact that, in order to validate the provisions, the Secretary of State seeks to make himself immune from court action. We had a detailed debate on that on Monday and I do not intend to repeat it.

However, I wish to ask the Secretary of State two sets of questions. Is he willing to consider—I have not given him notice of this—having the clause amended to bring it into line with what he said it meant when we discussed it on Monday? I refer in particular to clause 4(6). The matter was first raised on Monday by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short). The Secretary of State quoted subsection (1) which refers to "Anything done by the Secretary of State before the passing of this Act".

The right hon. Gentleman said:

"It is only in relation to actions taken before this Act was published that anything I do escapes challenge."

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said:

"Passed not published."

The Secretary of State replied:

"The hon. Gentleman is wrong, because since the Act was published I have done nothing nor will I do anything in the sense of this clause. I have taken no actions whatever in relation to the rate support grant settlement since the time that I realised it would be illegal for me to do so."

Therefore, my first question to the Secretary of State is: is he willing to consider writing into the opening part of the clause a replacement for the phrase using the words, "before 18 December 1986", which is the day that the Bill was published?

"before the passing of this Act"

My second question is more substantial, although the first was not insubstantial. During his first speech on Monday, the Secretary of State sought to explain that, in his view, the Opposition were wrong to believe that subsection (6), which makes the clause judge-proof, was wide in its effect. I asked what effect subsection (6) would have. The right hon. Gentleman replied:

"It depends on the subject of the litigation. If it has to do with total expenditure or involves the definition of total expenditure, the Act will prevail over any decision of the court . . . Where a matter has nothing to do with the definition of total expenditure or with the rate support grant calculation based on it, it is judiciable but it might be better for the court to await the passage of the Bill so that it knows the definition of total expenditure."—[Official Report, 19 January 1987; Vol. 108, c. 643-70.]

I accept that if the Bill as drafted was so narrowly defined as the Secretary of State said in that statement, at least there would be less to argue about than we think there is now. Our problem is that clause 4, as drafted, appears to be wide. I do not want to repeat what I said on Monday, but anyone who looks at part VI of the 1980 Act realises that it covers not just definitions of total expenditure or the rate support calculation based upon it, but a wide area —the whole scheme of block grant as set down in that Act. That is reinforced and buttressed by provisions such as section 8 and schedule 2 to the Local Government Finance Act 1982, sections 2 and 3 of the Education Act 1986 and section 2 of the Rate Support Grants Act 1986.

If the Secretary of State only wishes the clause to be as narrow as his statement to the House, is he willing to see it amended so that, under clause 4(1), it would read:

"anything done by the Secretary of State before the passing of this Act for the purposes of the relevant provisions in relation to any of the initial years or intermediate years and only in relation to the definition of total expenditure or the rate support grant calculation based upon it".

I am quoting from the words that the right hon. Gentleman used. If he means what he says, I can see no reason why that clause should not be limited as he said.

The Secretary of State says that our concern about the judge-proofing of this clause and clause 6 is unjustified. Earlier today my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) quoted respectable legal advice to the effect that our fears are justified. It would be a measure of the Secretary of State's true intentions if he agreed to consider the two points that I have raised and to make a substantive reply on Report.

10.45 pm

Ms. Clare Short: There is another very important point. The Secretary of State claims that the Bill is necessary to validate action that he took when he thought he was acting according to the law. We have said all along that if that were all, it would not be controversial. However, we know that in the past local authorities have taken action that, on good legal advice, they thought was lawful, but which is being made unlawful by the Bill. We must ask that the protection that is to be accorded to the Secretary of State should be accorded to local authorities. Their actions should also be validated and made judge-proof. If he were an honourable Secretary of State and if he were honourably trying to extricate himself from a legal difficulty, he would extend this protection to local authorities. He should explain why he is unwilling to do so.

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. When we debate amendment No. 87 there will be an opportunity to raise the Birmingham point at much greater length. However, I accept the point that, if the Secretary of State is seeking indemnity for past unlawful actions, what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander and the indemnity should apply equally to authorities like Birmingham.

Mr. Ridley: Since the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) has asked me to respond to two specific questions, I shall have great pleasure in doing so. It gives me an opportunity to clear up the slight misunderstanding which the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) was in such a ferment about and which he raised on a point of order. As one who purports to put legal challenges before the Committee, he might at least realise the difference between a point of order and a point of substance. But we live in hope.

The hon. Member for Blackburn first asked the Government to substitute an earlier date—18 December —for the validation. One minute's thought will make him realise that the period between 18 December and the passing of this Bill would be a period when there was no proper definition of rate support grant. The old definition would remain in force. It would be possible for authorities to bring a mass of legal cases, on the basis that at present the law is as it is under the 1980 Act and that the definition was not valid for the period covering the passage of the

[Mr. Ridley]

Bill. He must realise that that would not be a sensible solution. Law suits can arise not only from actions taken by the Secretary of State; they can arise on any matter that an authority chooses to pick upon at any time.

Secondly, the hon. Gentleman asked about the letter that his hon. Friend the Member for Copeland read out from the Association of Municipal Authorities. I am grateful to the association for sending me a copy of that letter. As I said on Monday, the provisions of clause 4(6) and clause 6(4) validate decisions and actions under those parts of existing legislation that involve total or relevant expenditure. I said that anything that is wholly extraneous to total or relevant expenditure and hence is not within those parts of the existing legislation that are specified in the Bill is not covered by the validation.

If we did not make the position on those past decisions absolutely clear, it would be a recipe for costly and unnecessary litigation. I hope that the Opposition do not believe that such litigation flowing from the technical flaw which we are here putting right would be in anybody's interest.

Mr. Straw: The Secretary of State is repeating what he said on Monday. Does he not accept that part VI of the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980 goes far wider than simply to define total expenditure?

Mr. Ridley: That is exactly the point that the hon. Gentleman has not grasped, that total expenditure or relevant expenditure is endemic in all of the sections of those Acts that are quoted in the Bill. It is impossible to disentangle some parts of any conceivable court case from those parts that relate to total expenditure. That is exactly what I said on Monday and that is the hon. Gentleman's answer.

Mr. Straw: It is true that total expenditure pops up in a number of sections in part VI of the 1980 Act, but that is not the exclusive concern of part VI. In order to bring the law more into line with the Minister's statements we have not suggested that there should no longer be any reference to part VI of the 1980 Act, but that that reference should be limited to references to total expenditure. What is wrong with that, since that is exactly what he told the House on Monday?

Mr. Ridley: I was right on Monday and I am right again today. It is impossible to distinguish some parts of part VI of the 1980 Act about total or relevant expenditure from other matters in that Act. It is the foundation upon which the whole of rate support grant and rate limitation have been calculated and one cannot, as it were, divide the foundations into some parts which are faulty and have to be validated and other parts which are not. If the hon. Gentleman will think about it, he will discover that such a distincition is virtually impossible.

Mr. Dobson: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ridley: This validation concerns only past decisions. When I come to make further decisions for all the years from 1983-84 to 1986-87 on which there are outstanding supplementary reports to be made, my decision——

Mr. Dobson: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ridley: —will be subject to the normal the courts. My decisions on the rate support 1987-88 and on reports and supplementar thereafter will be subject to review by the cour

Mr. Dobson rose——

Ms. Clare Short: The right hon. Gentleman s way.

Mr. Ridley: Under the formula in sched determination of rate limits for 1987-88 will be review by the courts. Decisions on future y limitation will, of course, also be subject to revi courts. I hope that puts to rest the misunderstand Opposition Front Bench speakers have broug debate.

Mr. Spearing: I would not have risen had the of State had the courtesy to give way when I o Friend——

Mr. Ridley: That is what I have done: I have to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Spearing: I hope that I can be as polit improve on the politeness of the right hon. Ge

Mr. Dobson: My hon. Friend could scarcely that.

Mr. Spearing: The Minister spoke about c applying to definitions of expenditure. He im that court capping, as I have nicknamed it, ap to definitions of expenditure. However, later h paraphrase—that everything is so intermingled impossible to separate one element from anothe appeared to validate the point made by my hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) that claus wider ambit that the Secretary of State planned

Earlier in the debate, the Minister f Government assured me that the Secretary of earlier today received a letter from me about t matters and that I would receive a reply. I ros point. I invite the Secretary of State to interve speech, because I will gladly give way to him. I r if the reply to that letter would come from him a cover these points at issue. If we went into the detail tonight we would not be popular with o Members. I want an understanding from the Se State that not only will I get a reply—I have that assurance already from the Minister of S that that reply will be signed by him and will ac matters that we have been discussing.

Mr. Ridley: I shall send the hon. Gentleman copy of Hansard with the speech that I have j which is a full answer to the letter from the AMA. me as saying:

"If it has to do with total expenditure or in definition of total expenditure, the Act will prevail decision of the court."

The Acts specified in the Bill all involve the def total expenditure, and that is inseparable fro matters concerned in those Acts. What I said was valid. I invite the hon. Gentleman to repeat wha well.

Mr. Spearing: I think that the Secretary of misunderstood me. The letter that I referred to w letter that I read out earlier today by my hon. F Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham); it w that I wrote yesterday which the Secretary of State received this morning. The right hon. Gentleman may not have seen it yet, but his hon. Friend the Minister has assured me that I will receive a reply, and I am grateful for the assurance that it will be signed by him.

Mr. Ridley: I shall be happy to sign the letter myself, having checked it carefully, it if will help the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Dobson: Will the Secretary of State tell the Committee whether the legal interpretation that he is now giving, partly in response to the representations from the AMA, is the interpretation that he has arrived at himself, or whether he has received legal advice from the officials of his Department to that effect? If it is the latter, are they the people who drafted the offending legislation in the first place?

Mr. Ridley: I must be responsible for my words at the Dispatch Box. I would not seek to hide behind the advice or assistance that I receive from others.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the Secretary of State carry on from his quotation from Hansard of 19 January? It says:

"It depends on the subject of litigation. If it has to do with total expenditure or involves the definition of total expenditure, the Act will prevail over any decision of the court . . . Where a matter has nothing to do with the definition of total expenditure or with the rate support grant calculation based on it, it is judiciable but it might be better for the court to await the passage of the Bill so that it knows the definition of total expenditure."—[Official Report, 19 January 1987; Vol. 108, c. 643.]

Since the Secretary of State has told us that they are so closely interwoven, can he—so that we can move on—give us a good example of some other form of definition that could be challenged in the courts along the lines that he gave in his speech on 19 January?

Mr. Ridley: It is like Question Time, Mr. Walker, but I am happy to continue as long as the Committee wishes.

A possible parallel would be the rateable value of an authority, which is nothing to do with the definition of total expenditure, but is a matter concerned in those Acts.

Another case that I cited on Monday was the Greenwich case, which concerns the multiplier. I do not want to prejudice that case, but the mulitplier has not yet been the subject of a decision because it might be embodied in the first supplementary report for 1986-87, and therefore will be subject to a final decision by me at a stage later than the passage of this Act. I do not want to prejudge the decision of the court, but that matter may be open to judicial review, as I said on Monday in response to the hon. Gentleman.

I have given him two examples of matters that are not within the scope of the Bill or proof against action by the courts. I am sure that with his great legal knowledge and ingenuity he can think of many more examples of the same sort.

Mr. Straw: We have all listened with care to the Secretary of State, but the truth is that the assurances that he sought to give on Monday do not square with the wide terms of the Bill as it is drafted. As the letter from the legal adviser to the Inner London education authority points out:

"There is nothing limiting the deeming provision to errors arising out of the erroneous definition, and therefore calculation, of relevant and total expenditure."

Our point is that the present wording clearly appears to cover any procedural impropriety, failure to consider a matter rationally or other unlawfulness in respect of anything done by the Secretary of State for those statutory puposes.

It is no good the Secretary of State seeking to be patronising with the Committee. I am afraid to say that we have been here before. Ministers have too often given bland assurances about the nature of legislation which have turned out not to be the case. Indeed, if the assurances that were given by his ally the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) had been correct, the Government would not be in their present mess. It is precisely because Acts have turned out to be something quite different from that which Ministers promised the House that we are in this mess.

What is more, Labour Members are aware of the fact that Conservative Members of Parliament pay scant regard to the rule of law. For them, it is simply an instrument to use or to discard as it suits them. It is all right for them to lecture us on the rule of law when it suits them, but when they make unlawful Acts, they come to the House to seek wide immunity from the law, and immunity not only in respect of Acts which everybody thought were valid in the past, but from errors, mistakes or acts of unfairness. It is that which we wish to pursue. It is on that that the Secretary of State has given no proper explanation and it is for that reason that we shall seek to vote against clause 4.

Question put, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Ron Davies and
Mr. Sean Hughes.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Clause 4, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again. —[Mr. Ridley.]

Dr. Cunningham: On a point of order, Mr. Walker. I wish to make it clear that we do not intend to oppose the motion to report Progress, but out of that motion arises a legitimate question that I hope it is appropriate to raise on a point of order. I shall raise it in whatever way is appropriate——

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The question is debatable. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to speak to the question before the House that is perfectly in order.

11.15 pm

Dr. Cunningham: I think that I shall continue with my point of order, Mr. Walker.

We are entitled to have a statement from the Government about their intentions on this business. We have just concluded discussion on clause 4. The Bill, as it now stands, has 17 clauses and five schedules. That was at the last count, but we have difficulty keeping up with the Government changes. Do the Government intend to table any further amendments or new clauses? When do they intend to bring the business back to the Floor of the House? Do they intend to introduce a timetable motion for further discussion of the Bill?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman has not correctly counted the number of clauses and schedules — [Interruption.] It sometimes helps to see what we have done rather than work on last year's "Bradshaw".

There is a possibility of one further Government amendment at some stage in the Bill's progress. It is not yet ready to be tabled. I have not counted the amendment's words any more than the hon. Gentleman has counted the clauses in the Bill.

We have made a little progress today, although not as much as we had hoped. I shall consult my right hon. Friends about the Government's intentions, and no doubt in due course the hon. Gentleman will come to know them through the usual channels.

Mr. Tony Banks: I wish to push the Secretary of State a little further. When can we expect an announcement? I have twice brought my sponge bag, and twice I have returned home early. My wife clearly thinks that I am having an unsuccessful affair.

Mr. Ridley: I really do not think that I can be held responsible for the disappointment of Mrs. Banks.

Question put and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again tomorrow.

Mr. J. J. Murray and Mr. J. J. Calvey

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Durant.]

11.18 pm

Mr. Stan Thorne (Preston): I am glad of the opportunity to raise this matter, and a little surprised that I do so somewhat earlier than I had expected.

James John Murray and John Joseph Calvey were arrested on 24 June 1985 and, despite five bail applications, remained in custody until acquitted after a trial lasting seven working days. They spent 16 months in prison.

On 7 October 1986, both men faced an indictment returned to the Old Bailey in London. There were two counts on the indictment against each man. One count alleged offences of wrongly withholding information under section 11 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984, and the second alleged a conspiracy to pervert the course of justice. The evidence against the men was that they had assisted two known terrorists to evade arrest by driving them out of the area of Leyland to south Wales at a time when they knew that the police were anxious to arrest them because they had been involved in a proposed act of terrorism.

The proposed act of terrorism was to cause an explosion at the Eagle and Child public house at Weeton. Throughout intense questioning Joseph Calvey denied any knowledge of the act of terrorism and only after James Murray had been questioned at great length over a period of several days did he make an admission, under duress, which he immediately retracted when solicitors were able to take his instructions. By virtue of their acquittal it is argued that a jury recognised that these men were innocent throughout and that their involvement in providing transport for terrorism was done innocently or, at the very worst, under duress.

Both men were refused costs at the end of the trial. That was especially harsh in the case of Calvey, because he contributed several thousand pounds towards his own costs, the burden of which would otherwise have fallen on the state. Both men had a record in the Preston and Leyland area as diligent and hard working. They often worked seven days a week. They were family men highly respected within the communities in which they lived. James Murray was known by his neighbours as a quiet, gentle man. Unfortunately, it may be said that he had a "wrong" relative whom, of course, he had not chosen.

Originally the men were detained at Risley remand centre where their families and friends had access to them and could give them moral support. In the case of Mr. Murray, this also enabled him to see his children. The committal proceedings into which the men were joined took place at Lambeth magistrates' court. Following the committal, they were remanded to Wormwood Scrubs. Despite entreaties, both on an emotional and financial basis, efforts to have the men returned to Risley failed. Their solicitors made repeated written requests and I made representations on humanitarian grounds to the Home Secretary for Murray in particular to be returned north to enable his wife and children to see him. This was refused.

It is my considered opinion that any claim for an ex gratia payment for compensation must be based on assurances the men received prior to them being charged with the offences. Whilst in custody James Murray was given promises. The first assurance Mr. Murray received was on page 85 of the handwritten depositions. It is as follows:

"Answer: Look I have got to go back there.
Question: What do you mean?
Answer: If they found out that I had been talking then that's it. I don't want knee-capping. That's if I'm lucky.
Question: So you do know something?
Answer: Remained silent.
Question: Its up to you Jim, only you know the truth about these matters. What you tell us does not get repeated anywhere else."

The second assurance Mr. Murray received is on page 107 and is in the following terms:

"Question: Right Jim let's carry on.
Answer: You don't know what they're like. I'm going to get a bullet in the back if I'm not careful.
Question: Try not to worry Jim. I have told you before what you tell us does not go anywhere. It is between the three of us."

Whilst not specifically recited in written evidence, Calvey was also given similar assurances. The effect of those assurances was that the information being provided by the men would go no further than the police officers to whom they were talking.

Contrary to this, not only was the information they were providing used to found an indictment on which they were acquitted, but it was published in the most detailed and graphic terms to those whom the men feared most and with whom, until a late stage in the proceedings, they shared the dock. To give the information provided to known and dangerous members of the IRA, despite their custody, is a breach of confidence of the gravest possible terms.

The purpose underlining the Anglo-Irish Agreement is that there should be co-operation between Irish nationals and British nationals to curtail the activities of terrorists. It is a tragedy that, when requested to provide information, and so doing on the basis that it is to be held in confidence, not only is that information used to prosecute but it is also published to those whom these men and their families most fear. This is surely entirely contrary to the spirit of the Anglo-Irish Agreement and, accordingly, it can be argued that these men are entitled to some ex gratia payment for the abuse of their trust evidenced above.

They have lost their livelihood and suffered considerable personal anguish and pain although they are innocent of any offence. The men were requested to provide information. On expressing fears for their safety before doing so, they were assured that the information they gave would be treated confidentially. Not only was it not treated confidentially, it was used to base a prosecution against them, the result of which was that they spent the equivalent of what was almost a two-year prison sentence in custody prior to being acquitted by a jury. If people are to be encouraged to provide evidence concerning acts of terrorism, this can hardly be described as an encouraging way of dealing with them.

I hope that the Home Secretary will consider these representations in depth and find it possible to make an ex gratia payment to Murray and Calvey in view of the special circumstances that I have briefly outlined.

I should be glad, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if you would allow the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) to contribute to the debate.

Mr. Den Dover (Chorley): It gives me this matter of major concern, to suppor for Preston (Mr. Thorne), who has spo of his constituent, Mr. Murray. I rise t of my constituent, Mr. Calvey. I am d hon. Friend the Member for South Ri present, because he covers the border Member for Preston and me.

The hon. Member for Preston h anxiety. I wrote to my right hon. Secretary on 16 December outlining th a major breakdown of confidence, as th have been let down badly. They were gi the police. They could not have been m their future and the possibility of IRA re confidence was betrayed.

The hon. Member for Preston has e that the men have lost their livelihood f have also suffered mental agony and t themselves and their families associated that have been spoken about.

I wrote often to the Home Office Mi Mr. Calvey moved from Wormwood S prison at Risley, to no avail. It was extre and expensive for Mrs. Calvey to Wormwood Scrubs to see her husband 15 minutes at a time. She did that regu confidence in her husband. I have met a Calvey about the circumstances relatin I am convinced that he is an absolutel down member of the community and th level best to get back into the construct delighted to say that he is taking steps

Therefore, it gives me great pleasure f hon. Member for Preston who admir matter. I sincerely believe that, in this payment is the only way to comp gentlemen.

11.35 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg) Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. D Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne) for h for their respective constituents so clear is a matter of concern to them and to Both my hon. Friend and the hon. Gentl case lucidly and persuasively. I am no give, and shall not give, a final reply propose to set out some consideration that, as yet, no final conclusion has b points made by the hon. Member for P hon. Friend the Member for Chorley w be taken into account and given the w evidently deserve.

For reasons that I hope the House do not have a full knowledge of the ca asked the Lancashire police for a f anticipate receiving one. It may be necessary to read the transcript of the case. The hon. Member for Preston, supported by my hon. Friend, referred to some of the major facts, but they bear repeating, at least in part, so that the case is put into its proper perspective.

Mr. Murray and Mr. Calvey were arrested in June 1985. The charges, as the hon. Member for Preston said, were under section 11 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984—namely, withholding information and perverting the course of justice. The charges relate to a period in 1983, when it seems clear that both Mr. Murray and Mr. Calvey gave assistance to Patrick Magee and Mr. Murray's brother, Patrick Murray, in particular by driving them to various destinations. As I understood the hon. Member for Preston, the issue is not whether the assistance was rendered—I think it is accepted that it was—but, rather, whether it was done with the necessary criminal intent. That seems to be the main issue with which we are concerned. They were committed for trial on 20 November 1985. The trial took place between 7 and 15 October 1986. As we have heard, they were acquitted.

It is regrettable that these men should have been held in custody for such a long time. It is a great misfortune for them and it is an unsatisfactory aspect of our criminal system that, from time to time, events such as this happen. The Government are conscious of the need to tighten these periods. The House will know that, under the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985, we took power to enable us to impose time limits. Without going into detail—this is not the most appropriate time to do so—we are about to apply statutory limits in three areas to try to combat the problem.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chorley also made a point about location. It is true that he wrote to the Home Office a number of times to make representations on behalf of his constituent to the effect that he should be held in the north and not in the south. Prisoners remanded in custody to await trial at the Central Criminal Court—where these two gentlemen were tried—are normally located in or near London. The Home Office explored the possibility of making an exception on compassionate grounds, but I am afraid that it was not possible because the establishments in the northern region were severely overcrowded and were simply unable to take prisoners from other regions. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley for his steps to promote his constituent's interests.

While the two gentlemen were in custody, and as the hon. Member for Preston has reminded the House, applications for bail were made on no fewer than five occasions—once to the justices, twice to Preston Crown Court and twice to the Central Criminal Court. It is perhaps useful and necessary to note that the applications for bail were refused. The House, and you in particular, Mr. Deputy Speaker, know the circumstances in which applications for bail are refused. It is a matter for the court, not for Ministers or the Executive. It would be wrong for me to comment, save to say that on five separate occasions a court with jurisdiction declined to grant bail.

It is being said that the two men require and deserve compensation. It is important that we should determine the circumstances in which compensation is paid. As a general proposition, there is no statutory right to compensation in cases of this kind. People who feel that they have been done an injustice in terms of false imprisonment or malicious prosecution can comm civil proceedings. I recognise that, in many cases, t an illusory remedy, in the sense that it is not one that are likely to pursue. My right hon. Friend the H Secretary has made a statement by way of a written a setting out his approach to ex gratia payments compensation. The circumstances in which compens is payable are set out in Hansard in a written answ 29 November 1985.

I shall summarise the points that must be made. W dealing with a number of classes of cases. Let us begi those cases where there has been a conviction—wh not the case here—and it has gone to appeal. Ther power and discretion, and it has been the practice, to compensation where there has been a free pardon or the conviction is quashed by the Court of Appeal House of Lords following a reference of the case section 17 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 or whe conviction is quashed by the Court of Appeal or the H of Lords following an appeal out of time. But the qua of the conviction must be founded on some new fact shows conclusively that there has been a miscarria justice. I appreciate that this case does not fall within criteria. I mention it so that the House has this ma the proper perspective.

A different situation arises where, as in the presen there was an acquittal. It is not my practice to read the Dispatch Box, but this point perhaps needs stat is important that we should have the phraseology in I would like to remind the House of the principle apply in cases where there has been an acquitta written answer to which I have referred states:

"There may be exceptional circumstances that compensation in cases outside these categories"— largely those to which I have referred.

"In particular, facts may emerge at trial, or on within time, that completely exonerate the accused pe am prepared, in principle, to pay compesation to peop have spent a period in custody or have been imprisc cases such as this. I will not, however, be prepared compensation simply because at the trial or on app prosecution was unable to sustain the burden of proof t a reasonable doubt in relation to the specific charge th brought."—[Official Report, 29 November 1985; Vol 689-90.]

It is plain from that answer, which reflects Government policy, that the mere fact that there h an acquittal does not give rise to any clai compensation. That may be wrong as a mat principle, but if we want to change it we must do statute and the House must decide that that is w want to do. However, that is not the law as it st present. The fact that someone has spent a long prison on remand is not a justification for cl compensation. It must go beyond that. My righ Friend the Secretary of State said that the facts m example, "completely exonerate" the accused Although I am the first to realise that when a pe acquitted he is in one sense exonerated, it is quite pla that phrase in my right hon. Friend's answer is d from a mere acquittal. If we do not like it, we change it by statute, but we have not, as a Hous that.

The mere fact of the acquittal does not bring within the range of those that have an obvious cl compensation. The mere fact of this length of custody on remand does not do so, although I acc it is regrettable that that should have happene representations to which the hon. Member for Preston referred do not fall obviously within the scope of the written answer and certainly the loss of income, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley referred, does not.

Mr. Stan Thorne: I am following closely what the Minister is saying. I appreciate the points that he has made. Would he consider that the circumstances in this case, which arise from the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984, the questioning by the police and the comments made by the men in terms of what happened, would be embraced by the references he has made in regard to the prospects for compensation?

Mr. Hogg: No, I would not. I accept that it is a discretionary remedy and it does lie within the power of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to go beyond what he has already said. However, what he has said in his written answer shows clearly his approach. It is an exceptional remedy that can arise only in exceptional circumstances. The circumstances that I for one would contemplate are when it is wholly plain that the person could not have committed the offence, because, for example, an offence was never committed, or it could not have been committed by the defendant because he was in France when the offence happened in Brighton.

That is not the case here. This case is an acquittal, the jury, as I understand it, having determined that they were not satisfied that the defendant, who did certain admitted acts, had the necessary criminal intent. On the face of it, that does not fall within the scope of the discretionary power that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has described.

I should like to say to the hon. Member for Preston and my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley that we shall give very serious consideration to the points that they both put so clearly, but at first blush, and without having had the full police report, and without having had the transcript, I have to say that it is not obvious to me that the case falls within the accepted parameters. The representations so carefully and persuasively put will be considered carefully, but I cannot in all honesty go beyond that.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fifteen minutes to Twelve o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Food Surplus

1. Mr. Powley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further action is being taken to reduce surpluses of food in Europe, beyond that announced on 17 December.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): I continue to take every opportunity to promote necessary reforms of common agricultural policy regimes which are for products in surplus or which involve excessive expenditure.

Mr. Powley: Will my right hon. Friend accept the congratulations of the whole House on the settlement that he recently achieved in distributing surpluses of butter, beef, milk and sugar? Does he agree that this is a practical demonstration of a caring Government? Will he tell the House how he intends to achieve the distribution of the food surpluses and when that distribution will take place? Will he also assure me that constituents in Norwich will receive their allocation of the surpluses?

Mr. Jopling: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind words. We are moving as fast as we can to make this food available. I cannot say exactly when it will happen in Norwich, but we hope that the first food will be made available next week. Only today I heard from the Commissioner's office in Brussels that, subject to availabiltiy, the products concerned are to be provided to a collection point convenient to the organisation—that is, the charity—in the quantities and in a form that it can use, and all reasonable costs up to that point will be borne by FEOGA.

Mr. Hardy: Has there not been the most astonishing negligence on the part of the Government in their preparations to deal with this nettle of surpluses? What steps has the Minister taken to ensure that, when the nettle is grasped, Britain and British farmers will not be stung far more than their continental competitors?

Mr. Jopling: As the hon. Gentleman's question was rather vague, I am not too sure whether he was referring to the food that we are making available or to the general agreement that we made in December. The December settlement was an extremely good one for Britain. We were able to preserve many of the most valuable parts of our support system, not least the continuation for two years of the beef variable premium scheme.

Mr. Shersby: I welcome the scheme to distribute EEC food stocks to those in need, but why is it proposed to transport thousands of tonnes of sugar from intervention stocks stored in 50 kg bags in Italy when there is an adequate supply of sugar in Britain to enable British companies to supply consumers with 1 kg bags? Also, how is it proposed that the charities concerned will distribute the stocks of meat and butter that are held in cold storage?

Mr. Jopling: I am glad to tell my hon. Friend that we had our first meeting with the charities on Tuesday—the day that the Council of Ministers agreed the matter. We have had a further meeting with the charities today and they are enthusiastic about making the scheme work. In relation to sugar, the plans are still being worked out, so I think that my hon. Friend is a little premature.

Mr. Tony Banks: Has the Minister seen the amazing story that Lord Avebury wishes to donate his body to Battersea Dogs Home?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is this a food surplus?

Mr. Banks: It is indeed, Mr. Speaker. In the event of this practice catching on, will the Minister give an undertaking that we shall not have an EEC mountain of dead Liberals?

Mr. Jopling: As I have been in the House a little longer than the hon. Gentleman, I had the misfortune to sit here with the noble Lord. Having heard what he had to say when he was in this House, no nonsense that he talks now comes as any surprise to me whatsoever.

Mr. Alexander: I do not wish to embarass my right hon. Friend, but does not my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley) have a point? What guarantee can I give my constituents in Newark that any of the surpluses will reach them, and soon?

Mr. Jopling: I had the great pleasure of addressing farmers in my hon. Friend's constituency only a very short time ago. We hope to have the food moving next week. We are awaiting the final rules and regulations from the Commission. Until we receive them, we are not in a position to move. My hon. Friend may have read in the press, however, that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State was present when the first butter was taken out of the cold store yesterday to start the thawing out process.

Dr. Godman: Is it not economically stupid to accept sugar imported from Italy when we have enough sugar in Britain to supply people in need? There is a cane sugar refinery in my constituency that would be able very effectively to package and distribute sugar in 1 kg bags.

Mr. Jopling: As there is no sugar in intervention stores in this country, no plans have been finalised as to how the scheme will work in relation to sugar, but I shall bear in mind what the hon. Gentleman has just told us.

Mr. Gale: I warmly welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement, although why the elderly and those in need should be denied access to wine and cheese I am not quite sure, as in some parts of the Community they are regarded as staple diet. My right hon. Friend said that the food would be distributed through charitable agencies. As many people are unable to get to those agencies, will he ensure that there is adequate publicity to make sure that those in need receive the goods that will become available?

Mr. Jopling: Perhaps I can correct my hon. Friend. Cheese is part of the scheme [HON. MEMBERS: "What about wine?"] We can all make jokes about wine. They have been made for many years in this House. As for the rest of my hon. Friend's question, we shall do our utmost to get things moving as soon as we can.

Mr. Foulkes: Is the Minister aware that this morning I was in touch with my successors at Age Concern, Scotland and that they were under the impression that the scheme involved the delivery of all the foodstuffs to centres where there were cooking facilities, with the implication that meals or cooked food would be provided for the elderly and those in need? Our understanding, however, and the impression created by the Minister, is that food will be delivered to individual old people. Will the Minister clear up that point? Will deliveries be made to the homes of elderly people and those in need, or will those involved have to go to food centres and have it doled out to them as though it were some kind of poor law soup kitchen?

Mr. Jopling: Many of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues have asked for this food to be made available to needy people. I am sorry that when we have such a scheme the only thing that the hon. Gentleman can do is to carp about it. We are hoping to distribute this food to people through, for instance, the meals on wheels service and in other ways. We are working as quickly and as hard as we can with the charities responsible for doing this. I remind the hon. Gentleman of the statement that I received earlier today from the Commissioner's office. It said that the food would be provided at a collection point convenient to the charity in quantities and in a form that it could use.

Mr. Harris: In looking to the future and devising means of controlling surpluses, will my right hon. Friend reject out of hand the crazy suggestion by the Leader of the SDP for a two-tier system for grain? Has my right hon. Friend taken note of the immediate reaction of the president of the National Farmers Union, Mr. Simon Gourlay, who told the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) that he did not even begin to comprehend the SDP leader's scheme and that it would lead to the annihilation of British farming?

Mr. Jopling: I think that my hon. Friend has repeated almost exactly the words of the president of the National Farmers Union about the extraordinary comments made in the Bledisloe lecture by the leader of the SDP. My only comment is that it must have been the most damaging policy proposal in living memory by any party in this country.

Mr. John: Understandably, the House does not yet have details of the food distribution scheme, but am I right in understanding that the total amount allocated for the scheme Europewide is £38 million? If that is right, it means that our share, both for the amount of food and for the cost of preparation of that food into a form in which it can be distributed, is about £3 million.

Mr. Jopling: The Commission announcement earlier this week said that there would be a review if the cost of the scheme appeared to be going beyond 50 million ecus, which in pounds sterling is not far from the figure that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. There is no expecific allocation to any one country. At the moment it is on a first-come-first-served basis. I do not think that any other Community country could show that it is further ahead with its plans than we are.

Mr. Bill Walker: Has my right hon. Friend yet had an opportunity to study in detail the proposals by the Labour party, which seem designed to remove the surpluses by levying a rates tax on agricultural land? In Scotland that would certainly be a most effective way of driving farmers off the land.

Mr. Jopling: I am glad that my hon. Friend raised that matter. While the Labour party proposal does not compete for one moment with the horrors for the farming industry contained in the speech by the SDP leader the other day, I hope that our farmers will look carefully at the implications of the Labour party's policy on the re-rating of agricultural land, the nationalisation of agricultural land and stringent new planning policies.

Mr. Maclennan: Does the Minister not recognise that his existing policy on cereals, relying as it does upon continuing high levels of production, and his record of total failure to bring supply and demand into anything like balance, is a disastrous policy which fails to discriminate between users and producers and has not protected British farmers? Is it not time that he brought new thinking to the problem of surplus cereal disposal?

Mr. Jopling: I suppose that the hon. Gentleman was one of the architects of his right hon. Friend's absurd speech. The leader of his party said that the vast majority of grain farmers in the community would be unaffected. He did not say that 44,000 of the 94,000 United Kingdom producers would be affected. That is a most discriminatory policy for British agriculture. It means that annual revenue for the average United Kingdom grain producer with 42 hectares of cereals will drop by £6,000 a year.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have allowed a long run of questions on this because of the implications for hon. Members' constituents, but we must now move on more rapidly.

Fertilisers

2. Mr. Weetch asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what studies have been conducted by his Department on the use of nitrogen-based fertilisers on farms and their effects on water catchment areas.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Donald Thompson): My Department is undertaking a number of studies aimed at enabling nitrogen fertilisers to be used more efficiently and reducing the nitrate available for leaching to water.

These include studies specifically designed to provide better information on leaching losses from a range of different crop and management practices.

Mr. Weetch: I thank the Minister for that answer. Does he realise that there is widespread and growing public concern about the level of nitrate pollution in parts of this country and that an important source of that pollution is nitrogen-based fertilisers? Is he aware that in a study by the Department of the Environment published last December East Anglis was classified as one of the worst polluted areas in the country? Does he agree that as the need for massive surpluses is well and truly over the Government should be maintaining stringent controls on the level of nitrate pollution? What is he going to do about that?

Mr. Thompson: I know of the hon. Gentleman's great interest in this matter, both within his constituency, which is probably why he asked the question, and on a wider basis. The Ministry fully understands the implications of nitrogen pollution and has already set in hand a series of studies, including work on the efficiency of the use of fertilisers and the uptake of soil-derived nitrogen, the response of grazed permanent grassland to nitrogen fertilisers, predicting fertiliser needs for individual farms, modelling the interaction of nitrate leaching, the need for denitrification of agricultural soils and leaching losses from different crop rotations, management practices and soils. We are working with the DHHS, the NFU, the Country Landowners Association and others along the lines suggested by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Will my hon. Friend acknowledge the importance of the work being undertaken at the National Vegetable Research Station in computer modelling of nitrogen usage by crops, which is pointing the way to reduced pollution? Is he aware that as a result of the arrangements it has made with the growers, as things now stand the Horticultural Development Council will have available to fund this and other important areas of research only half the amount previously indicated by the Ministry? Will the Minister restore the missing £1 million?

Mr. Thompson: I fully understand my hon. Friend's concern about the horticulture industry and the institute which I believe is based in his constituency. Research and development are important, and it is doubly important that those who benefit from research and development also contribute to it.

Mr. Randall: Will the Minister tell the House which parts of the country are unlikely to comply with the EEC directive?

Mr. Thompson: The way in which we implement EEC directives will mean that all parts of the country will comply with them.

EC (United Kingdom Presidency)

3. Mr. Jackson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was achieved during his presidency of the Council of Agriculture Ministers.

15. Mr. Key asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress in the reform of the common agricultural policy was made during his presidency of the Council of Agriculture Ministers.

Mr. Jopling: The Council in December took an important step towards the necessary reform of the common agricultural policy. During the course of our presidency the Council also agreed on a number of measures contributing to the completion of the internal market.

Mr. Jackson: Will my right hon. Friend accept warm congratulations from Conservative Members on his success in securing further steps towards realism in the common agricultural policy? With regard to recent proposals for a two-tier pricing system for cereals, does my right hon. Friend agree that while a social policy for European agriculture is necessary, if it is to be acceptable and equitable it cannot be based on the sort of flat rate concept that appears to be advocated by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), but must be tailored to the particular circumstances and structures of each member state?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend has made his point accurately. If the policies outlined by the alliance leader the other day were put into effect, 75 per cent. of the Community's grain production would qualify for the full support price, but in the United Kingdom only 30 per cent. would qualify.

Mr. Key: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, as well as being a successful start to tackling the problem of surpluses, his set-aside scheme has a welcome environmental impact?

Mr. Jopling: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he has said, because in December we agreed, among other things, the general principles of the socio-structural package, which opens the door much further than before to the implementation of our ideas for putting land aside from producing grain that we can neither eat nor sell.

Mr. Deakins: Why was there no mention in the Minister of State's statement on that agreement to the House on 17 December of the fact that the bulk of the saving in the milk sector will come from delayed reimbursement to member states of the cost of disposing of surplus dairy produce? There is not a word about that. Why did the Minister seek to mislead the House on that important issue when more than 100 per cent. of the saving is being thrust on to member states and is not a net saving to the policy?

Mr. Jopling: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman says that. If he looks at Hansard he will see that my right hon. Friend made it clear in his statement of 17 December that the cost of the additional programme of stock disposal for butter would be met over the four years beginning in 1989. The provision in the proposed budgets for 1987 and 1988 for those disposals will not, therefore, be used. That will result in a saving this year and next. From 1989 there will be large and increasing savings to the budget as a result of the milk package, even when the certificate of disposals has been met.

Mr. Livsey: Will the Minister consider the plight of beef suckler cow producers? Will he match the £6 that he obtained from the Community with the £6 that he is allowed to give per head on the beef suckler cow premium in Britain? In particular, will he reverse his decision on hill livestock compensatory allowances for beef suckler cows?

Mr. Jopling: We shall certainly consider the hon. Gentleman's point on the suckler cow subsidy, although we have already made our announcement about the hill livestock compensatory amounts. I am not surprised that the hon. Gentleman is pitching his question about beef when everybody else is particularly interested in his party's policy on grain.

Sir Paul Hawkins: I sincerely congratulate my right hon. Friend on his tremendous achievement in the EEC, but what does he believe the fall in the value per carcase of beef will be over the next couple of years? It is estimated by some people that it will be £50 per carcase. Will he do anything to fill the gap for those two years so that we do not lose our stock of beef up to that point?

Mr. Jopling: I remind the hon. Gentleman that some tough steps were taken with regard to the beef sector, which has been costing an enormous amount of money and considerably overreached last year's beef budget. I remind my hon. Friend that as part of the settlement that we achieved in December we managed to obtain a 6 per cent. devaluation of the green pound for beef. By the harmonisation of bull and steer prices, that figure was equivalent to a price rise for British beef producers of about another 3 per cent. The effect of the weakening of intervention, which has always been a system barely used in Britain compared with other countries—2 per cent. in Britain compared with 25 per cent. for beef in Ireland—puts the hon. Gentleman's point in rather better perspective.

Mr. John: Necessary as the 17 December decisions were as a start, will the Minister confirm that that merely cuts the overrun on the agricultural budget from 3·5 mecu to 2·5 mecu next year?

Mr. Jopling: Yes, I would not attempt to deny that the hon. Gentleman is entirely right, but we still have a long way to go to deal with the danger of overspending on the agricultural budget during 1987. No doubt Ministers will be very much applying their minds to that during the price-fixing negotiations in the next few weeks.

Sir Adam Butler: Will my right hon. Friend say a little more about the set-aside proposals? What form will they take, and when are decisions likely to be made? In particular, will my right hon. Friend accept that there should be a voluntary element in any scheme, whereby farmers with good land are able to participate just as well as those with poor land?

Mr. Jopling: Yes, we have always envisaged that our scheme would be voluntary at farm level, but that the whole scheme must be compulsorily available in each country within the Community. We believe that it should be available for any farmers who feel that it would be in the interests to take it. However, I envisage that farmers who find grain-growing to be at only marginal levels of profitability would find it more attractive.

Dairy Products

4. Mr. Torney asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of national consumption of dairy products is met by domestic production.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): The extent to which our consumption of dairy products is met by domestic production varies from product to product. But in 1985 domestic production of butterfat and solids not fat, two main components of milk, was equivalent to 89 cent. and 113 per cent. respectively of total dome production.

Mr. Torney: Why did we have 269,000 tonnes of Uni Kingdom butter in intervention in August 1986—a per cent. increase on the previous six months? Why do still import some 70,000 tonnes of butter from fellow E countries when we are cutting milk production in Brita

Mr. Gummer: Because we live in a democracy a people are allowed to choose the butter that they want buy. If the British housewife chooses to buy butter ma in another country, she must have the right so to do. I wa to see an attempt in Britain to get the British housewife realise that British butter is the best in the world.

Mr. Cockeram: Will my right hon. Friend confirm th according to the figures for the last year for which they a available, over 40 per cent. of butter produced in Brit was sold into intervention? Therefore, is it not time th the Milk Marketing Board gave less emphasis computers and statistics and more emphasis to the purpo for which it was set up, which was incorporated in its tit marketing, thereby better serving the hardworking Briti milk producer?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend has made a me important point. How can we argue against cuts in quot in Britain if we put such a large amount of the milk th we produce into intervention?

Mr. Home Robertson: In the course of the negotiatio on milk, has there ever been any consideration of spec provision for those regions which are net importers milk? Does it not add insult to injury for regions, or some cases nations, to see reductions and losses in jobs dairy farms and in creameries at the same time as they s more and more imported butter in their shops?

Mr. Gummer: I think the hon. Gentleman will acce that many of the countries in the EC make su arguments. We have decided that we must bear the burde of Community costs right across the Community, not on because so many could argue in that way, but because w find ourselves wishing to export our surpluses in oth products to other Community countries.

Agricultural Support

5. Mr. Conway asked the Minister of Agricultur Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of th effect on agriculture of supporting only standa quantities of production.

Mr. Gummer: I assume that my hon. Friend is referri to the ideas put forward by the SDP/Liberal allian whereby farmers would get a support price for only certain quantity of production. As outlined, this schem would mean that CAP support would go to only about or third of United Kingdom cereals production, yet woul apply to as much as 80 per cent. of continental productio Under the scheme two thirds of our cereal productio could well become uneconomic. The effects of th proposals of the right hon. Member for Plymouth Devonport (Dr. Owen) on our rural economy would b catastrophic.

Mr. Conway: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend fo his reply. Will he assure the House that any idea o introducing quotas on cereals or limitations on a per farm basis would be damaging to British farming interests? While he and his right hon. Friends have been most tenacious in defending British interests in the European negotiations, [Interruption]—irrespective of how boring or embarrassing this may be for Members of the alliance—may I ask him to spell out clearly to the farming community the effect on its income if it follows the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend might be interested to know that the likely effect on the annual cereal income of British cereal farmers would be £850 million. That would be the effect of the policy put forward by the SDP and supported by the Liberal party spokesman for agriculture when he spoke to the Farmers Union of Wales.

Mr. Maclennan: Why do Agriculture Ministers this afternoon find it necessary to misrepresent the speech made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) and fail to draw attention to the fact that he made it clear that any such scheme would depend crucially upon a tough negotiating stance on the issue of the British share of the cereals market? Does he not realise the weakness of the Government's position on national shares in the light of their failure to secure a fair share for British milk producers?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman's right hon. Friend made absolutely clear exactly the point at which the cut-off would take place, in advance of the negotiations. He told us the figures. All we have done is to work out the figures which he gave at Cirencester to an audience which included the president of the National Farmers Union, who said about the right hon. Gentleman that he clearly did not understand the matter at all and that his proposals were utterly catastrophic. The hon. Gentleman must go back to his right hon. Friend and ask him why he is not here to defend himself.

Agricultural Land and Buildings

6. Mr. Moynihan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the effect on farm incomes and food prices of de-rating agricultural land and buildings.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I estimate that in broad terms the value to the farming industry of the derating of agricultural land and buildings might amount to some £430 million. However, if agriculture was brought into the rating system the effect on farm incomes, and on food prices, might be very different, as this would depend on the response of individual farmers to such a massive additional burden.

Mr. Moynihan: Will my hon. Friend confirm that any policy that sought to rate or tax agricultural land, as evidenced by the policies of the Opposition parties, would substantially increase the cost of food to the consumers, which should be a matter of importance to every hon. Member in this House?

Mr. Thompson: I confirm that if agricultural land were to be rated or taxed in the ways that the alliance say there would be an additional burden, lower profits, more unemployment and higher food prices.

Mr. Allen McKay: Would the Minister care to give an assessment of the effects of de-rating in Lewisham, East?

Mr. Thompson: The people of Lewisham are eating more cheaply because agricultural land in this country is not yet rated.

Milk Quotas

7. Mr. Harris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures will be taken to compensate dairy producers for cuts in quota and related measures.

Mr. Jopling: Compensation under the European Community outgoers scheme has been increased by 50 per cent. to a total of 27·5p per litre, payable over seven years. In addition, compensation of 6·5p per litre per year will be paid for the 4 per cent. temporary suspension of quota.

Mr. Harris: Although I in no way minimise the impact of quotas and the toughening up of quotas on the farming industry, and indeed on the whole rural economy, may I ask whether my right hon. Friend agrees that the compensation to which he has referred provides something of a reasonable cushion for the problems presented by those cuts?

Mr. Jopling: That is right. The compensation of 6·5p a litre for the temporary suspension must be compared with the profitability of milk at 3p and 4p a litre. As my hon. Friend says, the compensation is generous by any standard.

Miss Maynard: Does the Minister agree that not only dairy farmers but dairy workers on the farm suffer from milk quotas? Does he accept that, in 1984-85, there was a threefold decrease in the full-time labour force in the counties with the highest milk production compared with previous years? Is it not high time that farm workers who lose their jobs because of milk quotas were compensated beyond the redundancy payments scheme, especially as some of the older farm workers will never get another job?

Mr. Jopling: The purpose of quota cuts is to eliminate surpluses and to secure a viable future for the dairy industry as a whole. I accept that that will be a painful process. It could involve job losses, but the extent of job losses is not yet clear. I do not think, according to the evidence of the changes during the previous round of quotas and the reduction in milk production, that there was a huge number of redundancies among farm workers. There were some, but I think that the hon. Lady will agree that it was not a huge number.

Mr. Hicks: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that should the existing voluntary outgoers scheme for milk fail to achieve the objective of a 2 per cent. reduction producers would still receive the 27·5p a litre payment under any subsequent compulsory scheme?

Mr. Jopling: No. I think that that would not be possible under the Community's rules. I hope that the new arrangements and the increased outgoers payments—whereby a producer with a 40-cow herd would receive £7,800 a year for seven years compared with £5,200 a year for seven years under the previous arrangements—will allow us to spend all this money paying people to go out of milk production so that we do not need to reduce the quotas of those who wish to remain in it.

Mr. D. E. Thomas: Will the Minister and his agriculture colleagues address the issue of the transfer of quotas between regions and nations in the United Kingdom? Is he aware of the concern that the increased potential number of bankruptcies among farmers may result in quotas being sold separately from farms, thereby increasing the transfer of quotas?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman might like to study the settlement that was made. He would find that, although the Commission proposed that the transfer between regions should be eliminated, in the end we agreed to allow those transfers to remain.

Farm Incomes

Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what will be the effect on farm incomes of the changes in arrangements for intervention buying of beef and support of production.

Mr. Gummer: The agreement reached in December reduces the price levels at which intervention buying is triggered and will set buying prices at levels related to market prices. But we in the United Kingdom have relied more on the operation of the variable premium to secure our producers' returns. This is being extended for two years and payments have already been increased by 5 per cent. as a result of the devaluation of the green pound.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend has given some figures which will mean that farmers will receive £35 a head less. Farmers have always lived in the real world, but they would like to know why Irish farmers have access to our deficiency payments, thereby undermining prices here?

Mr. Gummer: The situation is difficult, but it appears that the price of Irish beef will decrease by £70 a head, compared with the figure given by my hon. Friend. German farmers will receive £119 a head less, Italian farmers about £115 a head less and French farmers between £85 and £45 a head less, depending on whether they are bulls or steers. In this difficult situation the United Kingdom has come out very much better than other countries in the European Community.

Mr. John: Has the Minister calculated by how much it will accelerate self-sufficiency in the sheepmeat regime if beef producers switch to sheep production?

Mr. Gummer: Various things cause people to move into sheep farming, so the direct effect cannot be shown. The hon. Gentleman is right. So long as there are major surpluses in some areas and not in others there will be a tendency to create surpluses where they do not presently exist.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: Will my right hon. Friend acknowledge that the House is grateful for the devaluation of the green pound which was secured in the December negotiations in the Community? Does he recognise the important part played in the rural economy by the hill livestock farmer and the hill suckler cow herd? Will he monitor carefully the consequences on farm incomes in this particularly valuable sector of the rural economy?

Mr. Gummer: We shall certainly do that carefully. I hope that my hon. Friend will remind the farming industry that the United Kingdom Government achieved a better deal for beef farmers than did any other Government in the European Community.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Butterfill asked the Prime Minister if sh list her official engagements for Thursday 22 Janua

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet an meetings with ministerial colleagues and other addition to my duties in this House I shall be h further meetings later today.

Mr. Butterfill: Does my right hon. Friend recal when, on 29 July last year, the Financial Services Bi the insider provisions in it were being debated by noble Lordships, the noble and learned Lord described the insider trading investigation provisio both enormous and draconian? So draconian were that he thought they exceeded the principles of n justice. Does my right hon. Friend not find it surp that Opposition parties should take the attitude tha do over revelations of insider trading today which probably never have come to light if the legislation ha been enacted?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes his point. I remind the House that this Government are committed to rooting out financial wrongdoing wh it occurs, because this Government made insider tr a criminal offence and provided that upon convict should carry a prison sentence.

Mr. Kinnock: You will know, Mr. Speaker, that d the course of this morning you, and we, took what a we could to uphold the Government's view tha showing of a particular film would prejudice nat security. It is now apparent that earlier today a mag published what we understand to be the substance o film and that the 1 o'clock ITN news covered the m in illustrated detail. Given the failure of the Govern to take effective action to prevent publication of ma prejudicial to national security, will the Prime Minist us what she now proposes to do to try to mitigat effects of the Government's incompetence?

The Prime Minister: I understand the position to follows: yesterday the Attorney-General obtained i High Court an interim injunction restraining Mr. Du Campbell or his servants or agents from disclosin publishing or causing or permitting to be disclose published to any person all or any of the inform within his knowledge about a defence project. You, Speaker, have ruled upon this matter. With regard t specific matters which the right hon. Gentleman raise right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-Gener giving consideration to the New Statesman article. I sh point out that, in any case, one action that undern national security does not justify another. In meantime, I am sure that the whole House will wi uphold your authority, Mr. Speaker. Furthermo understand that my right hon. Friend the Leader o House will have something to say about this matter this afternoon.

Mr. Kinnock: I agree fully with the Prime Minister one breach, or threatened breach, does not justify a fu breach. Yesterday the Government properly took ou injunction against Mr. Campbell, but if they thought it covered all eventualities, why did they have to go back to court this morning? Is it not the case that the injunction covered neither publication nor the showing of the film? I repeat my question: what will the Prime Minister do now to mitigate that incompetence?

The Prime Minister: I am not sure that the right hon. Gentleman heard the terms of the injunction. The interim injunction was granted restraining Mr. Duncan Campbell or his servants or agents from disclosing or publishing or causing or permitting to be disclosed or published to any person all or any of the information within his knowledge. Regarding matters in the House, as the right hon. Gentleman is aware, there are specific circumstances when the courts will say that the matter is for Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker has ruled and I hope that the House will wish to uphold his authority. I feel sure that the right hon. Gentleman will wish to uphold the authority of the Speaker and that he will carry all his party with him. Unfortunately for all of us, some people seem to be more interested in trying to ferret out and reveal information of use to our enemies than in preserving—[Interruption.]—our defence interests and thus the freedom which we all enjoy.

Mr. Kinnock: Naturally, we fully uphold your ruling, Mr. Speaker. As the Prime Minister knows, this morning we did whatever was possible with complete readiness to try to ensure that if the Government sought to take action in court it would not be impeded by proceedings in the House. On that basis I must ask the Prime Minister why the Government took no action when it was clear for days that there was a strong possibility of the usual habit of the viewing of a film in the House? Why was that delayed until this morning? Why did the Government delay until yesterday seeking to take action against Mr. Campbell? Why did they fail to secure the prevention of the publication in a magazine? Those details are now out. What will the Prime Minister do to mitigate the effects on national security?

The Prime Minister: The Government took out and obtained an interim injunction yesterday, the terms of which I have made clear. A question arose about matters relating to the House upon which it was necessary to take action this morning, and the Government took that action. The matter was referred to Mr. Speaker, who made a ruling which I understand the right hon. Gentleman will uphold. I hope that he will carry all his party with him. As I have said, my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General is giving consideration to the New Statesman article.

Mr. Heseltine: Does my right hon. Friend recognise that we are concerned, not with the competence of the Government, but with the irresponsibility of an organ of Left-wing opinion? Does she further recognise that this is one more example of the failure of the Left to distinguish between the privilege of freedom of speech and a licence to peddle the nation's security?

The Prime Minister: I wholly agree with my right hon. Friend. Unfortunately, there are people who try to use freedom in order to destroy freedom.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Reverting to a previous question, may I ask whether the Prime Minister is aware that the director of corporate finance at Morgan Grenfell, who resigned recently, is a former director general of the Takeover panel? Is she further aware that the chief executive at Morgan Grenfell who resigned — [Interruption.] is a former member of staff of the Bank of England? If people from these backgrounds — [Interruptions.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to allow the hon. Gentleman to finish his question.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: If people from these backgrounds can be responsible for such serious shortcomings in that institution, does the Prime Minister not agree that there is an overwhelming case for more independent supervision of the City now that the Government have allowed untrammelled competition there, after the big bang? Will the Prime Minister consider introducing more independent supervision than that contained in the Financial Services Bill?

The Prime Minister: With regard to what the hon. Gentleman said about a particular bank, he knows that these matters are under investigation, and if he has any information to lay he should lay it before the appropriate authorities.

With regard to the action that this Government have taken, we have done more than any previous Government to try to root out fraud, wherever it occurs. In that regard we are still putting amendments through the House to current Bills to take further action, and in some places those amendments are being criticised for their severity. We shall take every action that we can to try to root out fraud, wherever it occurs.

Mr. Franks: Bearing in mind the debate earlier this week on the north-south divide and the Opposition's proposals to tackle unemployment in the north, is my right hon. Friend aware of the recent decision by Barrow district council to declare Barrow, of all places, a nuclear weapon-free zone? What words of comfort can my right hon. Friend offer to the 3,000 people and employees in the area who last month added to their existing shareholdings in Vickers?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has made his point very effectively. I may add the point that the shipyard flourishes. It is in charge of and responsible for building the new Trident submarines which will hold the nuclear deterrent that is vital to our security. Those employees, along with many other people if they are interested in defence and national security, must be interested in returning a Conservative Government for a very long time in the future.

Q2. Mr. Cabora asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 22 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cabora: Is the Prime Minister aware that on the ITN lunchtime news yesterday there was report about the arrest of Kelvin Chapman in connection with the vicious stabbing of the little girl down at Margate? In that broadcast it was said that the media had been asked to keep the name confidential. Unfortunately——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should bear in mind the sub judice rule, in respect of this case.

Mr. Cabora: I will. Only one newspaper in the country released that name, The Sun. Despite the fact that it had been specifically asked not to release the name, The Sun newspaper did so. Will the Prime Minister join with me in condemning this Murdoch publication for releasing that name and undermining the police operation? A quotation from the Maidstone police was that "the police are furious with The Sun newspaper".

Will the Prime Minister condemn that Murdoch publication for this irresponsible action?

The Prime Minister: I understand that the case is sub judice, but I make it clear that when requests of that kind are made I believe that they should be honoured.

Mr. Rowe: In the light of yet another horrific and fatal accident on the M2 yesterday, will my right hon. Friend take time today to commend the majority of heavy goods vehicle drivers who drive with care and discretion, and condemn those who seem to think that it is either clever or funny to harass smaller vehicles by driving much too close to them?

The Prime Minister: Yes. I gladly join my hon. Friend in thanking and congratulating those lorry drivers, and others, who have driven carefully, as we all should, on the motorways. I should also like to thank the many people who, during the very severe weather, made great efforts to get to their places of work to carry out their jobs.

Q3. Mr. Snape asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 22 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Snape: Was the Prime Minister aware of, and will she comment on, the telephone call made last Sunday by the press office at No. 10 Downing street to Mr. David Stevens, the chairman of United Newspapers, berating him for the publication in the Star of the roll of dishonour of Ministers and Conservative Members who defeated the private Member's Bill last Friday? Does the Prime Minister think that it is a proper use of public funds for a civil servant such as Mr. Bernard Ingham to bribe, berate and blackmail — [Interruption.] — to bribe, berate and blackmail that small section of the Fleet street press which does not already kowtow to the right hon. Lady?

The Prime Minister: I know of no such telephone call. [Interruption.]

Mr. Snape: I do.

The Prime Minister: As I understand that hon. Members—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: As I understand that hon. Members who ask such questions are responsible for the facts which they allege, I challenge the hon. Gentleman to give me the evidence. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."]

Mr. Snape rose——

Mr. Robin Cook: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does it arise out of questions?

Mr. Cook: You will be aware, Mr. Speaker, that you served a ruling on me this morning preventing me from proceeding with a private showing to me and colleagues of the BBC banned film. Your ruling turned on the injunction which was granted yesterday against Duncan Campbell. You will be aware that I and my colleagues have, of course, observed your ruling, but no chance to discuss that ruling with you has co you will understand that we wish to p considerations why we would invite you to ref ruling. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I believe perfectly in order if I put such considerations Speaker. May I put to you two considerations not have been available to you when you made this morning?

First, this morning, an application was m Attorney-General for an injunction against other named Members of Parliament to p showing of this film. That application, which been made quite rightly, was also quite rightly by the courts. As the same judge who granted injunction has declined to grant a specific extens injunction to encompass those named M Parliament, may I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, th be open to you to reconsider your ruling, as the granted the injunction on which you found has to specify the Members of Parliament covere injunction?

The second consideration that I should like you, Mr. Speaker, to invite you to reflect on you is that, since you made your ruling, it has becom clear that the information in the film that we w to see is public knowledge and is widely dissemi not merely through the medium of the New Sta was also the lead story at lunchtime today on sector television channel.

It is clear from the information now in domain that the film raises matters of considera concern, such as, was the expenditure an ap charge on the Defence budget, and were under Parliament contravened? These are matt Parliament should have an opportunity to consi make up its mind about. More important, it eccentric if Members of Parliament were to themselves the opportunity to consider informat is now widely available to our constituents and w be obtained on any bookstall in any railway Great Britain.

In the light of these two developments, Mr. may I invite you to consider your ruling and, if to reflect upon it overnight and come back, I h a decision that will enable the House to conside important issues of public policy raised by the

Mr. Hayes: Further to that point of or Speaker. We heard the Leader of the Opposition moments ago that he abides by your ruling. We h as well that he abides by the injunction that wa for by Her Majesty's Government. Yet now we h from one of his closest advisers, the hon. Me Livingston (Mr. Cook), who seeks to challe ruling. Perhaps we could have a full statement Labour party.

Mr. Speaker: This is a matter of very con importance to the whole House. Perhaps the H allow me to say a word about it.

I was told yesterday evening that hon. intended to show a film in the House which had subject of a High Court injunction preventing its This raised issues which I believe the House will it to determine in relation to the rooms in the Pala the control of the House. To provide time for this to be done, I gave instructions that nothing should occur to prejudice the position until the House itself had an opportunity to discuss the matter.

As I say, this is a matter for the House, but the House was not sitting at 11 o'clock this morning when it was intended to show the film. Therefore, urgent administrative action had to be taken, and that is what I authorised. The House should now consider the matter in due course and make its own determination.

The precise application of an injunction is a matter of law. What I was doing was to ensure that, whatever the scope of its application, the injunction should be observed within our precincts until such time as the House makes its own determination on the matter.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): It might be helpful if I indicate that the Government recognise that this is a topic of the utmost importance which the House should have the opportunity to debate at an early date. The matter is now being prosecuted through the usual channels.

Business of the House

3.37 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House to tell us the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 26 JANUARY—Timetable motion on the Local Government Finance Bill followed by completion of remaining stages of the Bill.

TUESDAY 27 JANUARY—Opposition Day (6th Allotted Day). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion entitled "The Failure of the City to serve the Nation".

Motions relating to the Dockyard Services (Devonport) (Designation and Appointed Day) Order and the Dockyard Services (Rosyth) (Designation and Appointed Day) Order.

WEDNESDAY 28 JANUARY — Second Reading of the Ministry of Defence Police Bill (Lords) followed by Second Reading of the Parliamentary and Health Service Commissioners Bill.

Motion on the London Regional Transport (Levy) Order.

THURSDAY 29 JANUARY—There will be a debate on a Government motion to take note of the White Paper on developments in the European Community January-June 1986 (Cmnd. No. 9911).

FRIDAY 30 JANUARY—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 2 FEBRUARY—There will be a debate on the Royal Navy on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman.

The Leader of the House has announced that the Government will next week introduce a guillotine motion to curtail scrutiny on a local government Bill that is highly technical and contains unprecedented provisions that place the Secretary of State for the Environment above the law and afford him both retrospective and future protection from further legal challenges. How can the Government justify proceeding with such haste when they have already tabled over 40 substantial amendments to their Bill and are even now compiling more? Will those further amendments be tabled today so that they can be properly scrutinised and, if necessary, amended on Report? If they are not tabled today, how can the House fairly give attention to them on Monday of next week?

Today's Order Paper gives notice of a further rate support grant Bill. I understand that the Vote Office is saying that the Bill will not be available to hon. Members until tomorrow. That treats the House with contempt, and makes nonsense of the Government's claim last year that the Rate Support Grant Act that received Royal Assent in October would clarify the law on rate support grant settlements. All this creates a climate of great uncertainty for local government of all political colours, and makes the delivery of vital community services even harder than it has been hitherto. Is this not another example of the incompetence and arrogance of the Secretary of State for the Environment? Will he, even at this late stage, reconsider the way in which the House is to proceed with this legislation, and withdraw the guillotine for next week?

Mr. Biffen: We all have our distinctive rhe situation, and what the right hon. Gentl "curtailing scrutiny" I would describe as pr measured debate on this important Bill. Mu already been taken on the issue, and it will be Monday for the House adequately to consider and the arguments.

As to the rate support grant, the right hon. G anxiety about the prospects for the considera legislation will not be fulfilled.

I shall look into the right hon. Gentleman's the amendments to the Local Government F and see what can be done to meet it.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): Will my right find time to arrange a debate on industria Given that the former chairman of the B council, who was largely responsible for engi Grunwick strike in 1976, has now turned up campaign leader in the Devonport dockyard, the interests of the economy be served by disco is behind such a move?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises an inte specific point to exemplify his general concern relations would be a good topic for debate if had that amount of time, but I can hardly ad have such time when I am announcing a Perhaps my hon. Friend might seek an A debate on the narrower point.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill Leader of the House had time to reflect on the the South African Government have had discu the Isle of Man to pursue the taking over of so that they can evade international trade sanc the right hon. Gentleman be able to report to on this matter in the next few days, or can statement?

Mr. Biffen: I shall look into the matter of and let the hon. Gentleman know the result.

Dr. John G. Blackburn (Dudley, West): W hon. Friend give serious consideration to an e in connection with early-day motion No. 390 House regrets Her Majesty's Government's dec award the £1·41 weekly increase to elderly pol notes that the total cost of the increase would ha than £500,000 per annum; and calls upon He Government to review urgently the decision, e this was the amount agreed by the Police Committee.]

It refers to police reserved rate widows, whose is 84 years. Since agreement was reached by Negotiating Board on 25 February, 1986, 1,0 pensioners have died. This is an urgent matter receive the compassion of the House.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washin the Leader of the House had an opportuni articles in the newspapers about the seriou London and other cities as a result of the fa water system? 90 water mains burst every day. As this is due purely and simply to the Government's policies not to allow water authorities to invest in infrastructures, to reduce borrowing requirements and, when authorities such as Thames Water make a profit, to turn authority chairmen into overt tax collectors, will the Leader of the House arrange a statement on the crisis early next week?

Mr. Biffen: I am not confident that the responsibilities can so simply and sharply be allocated as the hon. Gentleman suggested. Of course, I shall mention the matter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): May we again have a debate on the philosophy of the future of the Westminster Parliament in relation to the European Parliament? Is my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House aware that Sir Henry Plumb, whom we were all pleased to see elected President of the European Parliament—we were almost as pleased as he was—said two alarming things upon his election? One was that he was born an Englishman and wished to die a European, but he also said that the European view must prevail over national views if the European Parliament is to make real political progress as the legitimate and sovereign state of Europe. Does he not agree that those views would reduce Westminster to the status of a parish council? Should not this Parliament express the clear view to Sir Henry, before he becomes too entrenched in Europe, that he was born English, that many of us want to remain English and we shall fight to remain English?

Mr. Biffen: I note that my hon. Friend stands in the way of Sir Henry and his ambitions. That is a happy situation.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Is the Leader of the House aware that, as a result of the repeal of the Truck Acts which came into force on 1 January, many hundreds of thousands of people now have bank accounts who never had them before? While the country is quite rightly concentrating on major inequities of the City, we have not had a debate about the way in which ordinary banks are entitled to charge ordinary people interest that can range up to 25 per cent. without informing them how much is being charged. May we soon have a statement from the Minister with responsibility for consumer affairs or from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, or at least a warning to people to be careful about how they are treated by their local banks?

Mr. Biffen: I am most grateful to the hon. and learned Gentleman for drawing our attention to the fact that countless thousands of working class people today have savings habits that once were the possession of the bourgeoisie. I shall certainly draw the hon. and learned Gentleman's point to the attention of my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for consumer affairs.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): In view of the great importance to many hon. Members of the Common Market agricultural settlement shortly before Christmas, will my right hon. Friend say whether next Thursday's debate will involve agriculture and, if so, whether an Agriculture Minister will speak in it?

Mr. Biffen: Obviously, the scope of the debate essentially will be within the judgment of the Chair. I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friends to the anxiety that my hon. Friend expressed. I am grateful to him for making the point about Thursday's debate. Of course, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark) will be able to argue all that he succinctly said and at great and welcome length on that occasion.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Will the Leader of the House assure us that, during the debate about the Devonport dockyard order, an opportunity will be afforded to discuss the company's refusal to accept responsibility for the operation of Devonport dockyard and the radioactive wastes already stored there? To facilitate a full discussion on that aspect, will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that, before the debate, full details are released about the Government's intention to build a rad-waste dissolution treatment plant close to Devonport dockyard and what the Government intend to do with it after that is done?

Mr. Biffen: Clearly, the width of the debate will depend upon the judgment of the Chair. I have a sufficiently robust faith in the hon. Gentleman's skills as a parliamentarian to know that he will make whatever speech he intends to make. I shall draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the information that the hon. Gentleman seeks.

Mr. David Gilroy Bevan (Birmingham, Yardley): Will my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House note early-day motion 439 urging the introduction of identity cards with bearers' photographs?

[That this House notes the use of identity cards in various Commonwealth, European and other countries, and the requirement in Northern Ireland that driving licences shall carry the driver's photograph; believes that the universal issue of identity cards in the United Kingdom would assist the prevention and detection of crime, including social security fraud and illegal immigration and that, far from lessening civil liberty, it would protect the law-abiding from troublesome and unnecessary inquiries by police and security officers; and therefore urges the Secretary of State for the Home Department to consider the early introduction of identity cards bearing the holder's photograph.]

Will he speak to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department so that an early statement can be made and the House given an early opportunity to debate this matter further?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend refers to a highly controversial topic, but I shall most certainly convey his request to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Further to the matter raised by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), will the Leader of the House accept that there is a great deal of concern about the revelations in today's Independent about the secret deal between the Isle of Man Government and the Government of South Africa to set up some kind of sanctions-busting operation? Since the freeport is set up with the authority of Her Majesty's Treasury and since the Home Office has ultimate responsibility for the good government of the islands, when some scandal like this happens there ought, surely, to be some arrangement for the appropriate Minister to make a statement to this House of Parliament so that we can ask him questions.

Mr. Biffen: I cannot in any sense endorse the hon. Gentleman's rhetoric. I have already said that I shall refer to my right hon. Friend the point that has been raised. In doing so, I shall also draw his attention to the point that has just been made.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): My right hon. Friend will recall the debate last Friday on television licences for the elderly. However he views the outcome of that debate, it has created a great deal of resentment among elderly people. In particular, they have mentioned that hotels pay for only one television licence, yet they may have many hundreds of rooms with television sets. There is also a great deal of unrest about the structure for the collection of the licence fee. I think that it is time that we began a major review of this subject.

Mr. Biffen: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that point. I shall certainly convey those considerations to my hon. Friends.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to early-day motion 473 on the anniversary of the Wapping dispute.

[That this House applauds the fortitude and resolve displayed during the last 12 months by the men and women on the Wapping picket lines; notes that in successive ballots they have rejected offers of redundancy hand-outs; supports the call for Mike Hicks to be released from prison as advanced by the recent Labour Party National Executive Council resolution; condemns the Tory-backed Murdoch's systematic use of money earned by British workers to finance his multi-national business ventures; and believes that the House of Commons should debate these issues of civil liberty, undemocratic control of the media and workers' rights.]

Will the Leader of the House tell us whether there is to be an early opportunity for this dispute to be debated in the House so that the Government can tell us why they have failed to intervene in the dispute, which up to now has cost London ratepayers about £14 million in excess police costs? Indeed, it is no more than a very expensive exercise to get filthy, disgusting Murdoch rags out of Wapping.

Mr. Biffen: I note that that is the hon. Gentleman's jaundiced view of such a great and historic newspaper as The Times. However, I am disinclined to accept his view that there is a Government responsibility on anything like the scale that he suggests. No provision has been made for Government time to be devoted to this subject. It will be interesting to see whether the Opposition provide any of their time for such a debate.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): Has my right hon. Friend had time to note the publication today of a document by Lincolnshire county council and others on the safe disposal of nuclear waste? It relates to Britain's method of dealing with it and to the methods used by France, Sweden and West Germany. Bearing in mind the widespread concern of many people in this country about the disposal of low-level nuclear waste, not least the concern of my Newark constituents, and bearing also in mind the fact that we have not debated this matter for probably a year, will my right hon. Friend offer a debate on this subject to assuage the anxieties of many hon. Members?

Mr. Winnick: Fifty years ago.

Mr. Biffen: There is no point in the hon. Gentleman saying, "Fifty years ago". We know that he is faithful to Socialism and has not changed one jot in those 50 years.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): The announcement by my right hon. Friend of a debate on the Royal Navy is welcome. May I draw his attention to last week's request and my request, repeated today, for a debate on the merchant marine, shipping and shipbuilding and all that goes with them, especially in the light of the strike by Austin Pickersgill shipyard workers at Sunderland which began on 5 December, finished after five weeks, and started again yesterday.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes a point of both general and specific interest to the House. Clearly the terms of debate for Thursday will be set by the Chair. However, there is a good case for arguing the interdependence of the marine fleet and the Royal Navy and I wish my hon. Friend all success when he develops that argument.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Will my right hon. Friend consider the wisdom of holding a major defence debate late on Monday week? Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), was taken so seriously ill yesterday that he was unable to present his private notice question? Because his illness must be of the most serious nature, would it not be fairer to the right hon. Gentleman to give him sufficient time to be able to recover rather than have him undergo the rigours of such a major debate at such short notice?

Mr. Biffen: We assume that the Lobby would observe its normal conventions.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend arrange an early statement from the Home Secretary on the Metropolitan police decision to tackle racial attacks in Newham and in the London borough of Ealing? Is he aware of the importance of that, in view of the fact that it is said on high authority that Ealing Labour council is considering refusing to allow the police to deliver literature relating to their work in that operation to council property, including council houses? Is he also aware that Ealing Labour council has so far totally failed to meet the Ealing community relations council since it was elected, although there were regular meetings between those two bodies when Ealing council was Conservative controlled? The Conservative council cared about race relations.

Mr. Biffen: Although we have a debate upon the European Community next week, we do not have a debate upon Ealing. My hon. Friend puts me in some difficu on this matter, but I shall certainly report his anxieti my right hon. and hon. Friends who have a responsi in this matter.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Does my hon. Friend share my concern and that of many peop Britain about the continuing abuse of diplo immunity? Does my hon. Friend agree that diplomats should behav gentlemen and that that should apply to the spouse registered diplomat. When they come to Britain they represent their country responsibly and if they brea law they should suffer the consequences in Britain?

Lloyd's

4.3 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the report of the committee of inquiry into regulatory arrangements at Lloyd's.

I have today laid before the House, as a Command Paper, the report of Sir Patrick Neill and his colleagues. I am sure that the House will wish to join me in expressing warm appreciation of their work.

The committee was set up by my predecessor a year ago to consider whether the regulatory arrangements being established at Lloyd's, under the Lloyd's Act 1982, provide protection for the interests of members of Lloyd's comparable to that proposed for investors under the Financial Services Act 1986. The committee recognises the major contribution Lloyd's makes to the national economy. The report notes that the council of Lloyd's has strengthened the regulation in its market by putting into effect a major programme of reform since the 1982 Act entered into force.

The committee makes 70 recommendations, which should bring the two levels of protection into line. The committee does not believe that the solution to the problems it has identified is external supervision of Lloyd's, or an extention of the role of my Department. It recommends, instead, a change in the balance of representation on the council of Lloyd's by increasing the number of nominated independent members. They and the elected non-working members would then command a majority.

The committee also recommends an enhanced role for the nominated members in Lloyd's, for example, through their chairing of important committees.

The committee's conclusion is that its recommendations will make the protection of Lloyd's members comparable to that provided under the Financial Services Act. The committee has, moreover, taken care to strike a balance between the safeguarding of members' interests and the protection of Lloyd's policyholders.

The Government believe that the report provides a good basis for the further development of measures to protect the interests of Lloyd's members. I shall, of course, be discussing the report with Lloyd's. I shall want to hear its proposals and timetable for action. I expect Lloyd's to take all the necessary steps to bring the protection offered to members up to the standard of the Financial Services Act. I shall therefore be following closely with it its progress in this matter.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): The Secretary of State referred selectively to sections of the report. Why does he not tell us that, although the report notes that Lloyd's has made approved changes since 1982 it also reaches the conclusion in paragraph 1.5 that, notwithstanding the changes, progress has not been sufficient and it goes on to detect some shortcomings?

Is it the case that the Government did not draw our attention to that because it would invalidate, to some extent, one of their arguments for excluding Lloyd's from the Financial Services Act 1986? Will the Secretary of State bear in mind the narrow terms of reference given to the committee? The terms of reference were to consider whether the protection for names was comparable to the proposed protection for investors under the Financial Services Act. Surely the terms of reference should have been what measures are necessary to restore confidence in Lloyd's? If that question had not been put properly a much more interesting report might have emerged.

Is the Secretary of State aware of the well-expressed comment in many of the newspapers that the chairman, Sir Patrick Neill, wanted much stronger action in the recommendations but was out-voted by his colleagues on the committee? Is it not the case that the proposed changes in the council merely amount to a re-jigging of the membership and not to any fundamental change in Lloyd's? Is it not surprising that although the report identifies the importance of the independence of the chief executive, it proposes no action to secure the independence of the chief executive? That is an important matter in view of the fact that Mr. Hay Davison, a former chief executive, found it impossible to maintain his integrity in the position he had taken up. Is it not clear that the answer is to bring Lloyd's simply and clearly within the provisions of the Financial Services Act so that the same standards apply throughout all of our financial institutions?

Will the Secretary of State tell us how many references there have been from Lloyd's to his Department about persons in respect of whom prosecutions might be taken? How many proposed prosecutions are under consideration by the Department of Trade and Industry? What action will be taken to bring offenders to book, bearing in mind that some major scandals have occurred in Lloyd's? Does the Secretary of State think that it is scandalous that Mr. Peter Cameron-Webb and Mr. Peter Dixon, who have committed gigantic frauds, have not only escaped prosecution but are apparently conducting insurance broking business in Florida?

Mr. Channon: The Director of Public Prosecutions is looking at several cases and my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General made a statement to the House on 20 November, to which I refer the right hon. and learned Gentleman, which deals with the point he has in mind. On the matter of insufficient progress, the whole purpose of my statement is to say that we wish to provide for Lloyd's comparable arrangements to those under the Financial Services Act. Simply to bring it within the terms of the Act would be wrong and that was widely recognised during the passage of the Bill through the House. It is true that some hon. Members, including some of my hon. Friends, took a different view. I think that what the new report suggests are comparable arrangements that should be satisfactory to the House.

I have no evidence to believe there is a shred of truth in the suggestion that Sir Patrick Neil was out-voted. It is certainly not reflected in the report. I shall now study the report with great care and I shall study any comments made by the House before coming to final conclusions. I want Lloyd's to take all the necessary steps to bring the protection offered to members up to the standard of the Financial Services Act at the earliest opportunity. The right hon. and learned Gentleman will recognise that it says on many occasions in the report that the council has transformed self-regulation for Lloyd's. Indeed, paragraph 1.4 says:

"We know of no profession or equivalent organisation which has accompished such a major programme of reform in such a short timescale."

Mr. Leon Brittan (Richmond, Yorks): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the carping about the terms of reference in seeking to probe the internal workings of the committee by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), is a classic example of sour grapes because the committee did not come to the conclusions to which he wanted it to come? Will he further agree that the conclusions of the committee amply confirm the view that was formed that, although changes were needed at Lloyd's, it would be wholly inappropriate to bring about those changes by amending the Financial Services Bill to include Lloyd's? Will he also agree that the time has come, in the light of the positive but substantial recommendations of the committee, for him to urge Lloyd's strongly to proceed with the further changes that are necessary and appropriate to put matters in order?

Mr. Channon: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend—who was responsible for setting up the committee. I entirely agree with his criticism of those who criticise the terms of reference, as the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) did a few moments ago. My right hon. and learned Friend is entirely right to say that it would be inappropriate—as the report makes clear—to bring Lloyd's within the terms of the Financial Services Act. We must look to Lloyd's to act with urgency and to come forward with measures, in the light of the report, to provide protection comparable with that under the Financial Services Act. I shall be discussing the matter with Lloyd's, and I hope to arrange a timetable that will be agreeable to all parties in the House.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): Will the Secretary of State assure the House that the Government will insist that Lloyd's takes up two recommendations—one on compensation for the names and the other on the appointment of an ombusdman to settle internal disputes? Equally important, will he tell the House about the political shenanigans that occured in the preparation of the report and the pressure, expressed and implied, that was brought on Sir Patrick Neill to stop him following his natural inclination to bring Lloyd's under a wider statutory purview, for which the Opposition have constantly argued?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Member must take responsibility for his own comments. I have no evidence that what he says has the remotest bearing on the truth. Sir Patrick Neill can answer for himself; he has given a press conference this morning, and no doubt he will consider what the hon. Gentleman has said and answer it in any way that he likes. I do not believe that what the hon. Gentleman says is the truth, but Sir Patrick must speak for himself. Neither I, nor, as far as I know, anyone else, has put any pressure on Sir Patrick Neill to come up with any solution. Anyone who knows him knows that it would have been totally counter-productive to make any effort to do so.

As to the question of compensation and the ombudsman, we shall look carefully at all the recommendations in the report and I shall keep the House informed of our thinking on these matters.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): While we all look forward to reading the 70 recommendations of this report with the greatest care and interest, may I put it to my right hon. Friend—I am sure that he shares this view himself—that it is a matter of concern that certain cases of really serious alleged irregularities — which have been very publicised in great detail—have still, after a very long passage of time, not resulted in even the launching of a prosecution? This does seem to contrast rather mysteriously with the relative speed with which, for instance, the Securities and Exchange Commission was able to act in New York in the case of the Boesky scandal.

Mr. Channon: I have some sympathy with what my hon. Friend says about prosecution. However, that is a matter for the Director of Public Prosecutions, and, as I said, my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General made some comments to the House in late November about that matter. I shall draw what my hon. Friend has said to his attention.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): If the Prime Minister's recent remarks about the Tory Government taking tough action against the City are to mean anything at all, the Minister should have come to the Dispatch Box today and said that the cosy club, self-regulated atmosphere at Lloyd's would end. What he is really saying is that Lloyd's can do as it likes. The Government will have a few words on the quiet, but the Minister will not change the arrangements. We shall return to the Cameron-Webb and Dixon days, when they got away with £39 million. The Berlin wall mentality will continue to operate at Lloyd's, where nobody else can interfere, including the fraud squad. Why should that area of the City be a no-go area, when 138,000 claimants on the DHSS are done by those same fraud officers?

Mr. Channon: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, he cannot have studied the report with care — [Interruption.]

Mr. Skinner: I read it before today.

Mr. Channon: I read what the hon. Gentleman said in The Guardian, but what he says bears no relation to the truth. This was an independent committee, and the House will have to consider its decisions. The committee agrees that that is an acceptable basis on which to go forward, but I want to make sure that there is a proper timetable and that Lloyd's makes the necessary changes. I believe that is what the House wants to see, and that is what we shall do.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Will my right hon. Friend agree that the keynote of the recommendations — the increase in the independence of the governing body—should be accepted to ensure that all parties involved in Lloyd's, and the public, can have confidence in Lloyd's. Furthermore, the key question is whether one can strike a balance—as the report accurately does—between self-regulation, which has to be maintained for practical reasons, and tough regulatory action for defaulters.

Mr. Channon: I agree with my hon. Friend. It is important that the change in the composition of the council should take place. I shall discuss that point with Lloyd's at an early date. Lloyd's have issued a statement on its preliminary views, and at first sight that seems encouraging, but I take note of my hon. Friend's views.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): is the Secretary of State aware that that undertaking is most welcome, because the recommendation to increase the number of independent members is of importance in trying to ensure that there is public confidence in the way in which Lloyd's will be regulated in the future? Will he ensure that that recommendation—while being brought in quickly—does not only refer to Lloyd's? Does it not also imply that there is a case for having the same sort of independent majority on the Securities and Investment Board, which is covering the work of the rest of the City?

Mr. Channon: On the first point, I welcome the hon. Member's remarks and I am glad to have his support. However, I do not think that the situation is on all fours with the SIB, but it is open to me to keep under review the number of lay members that there will be on the SIB. I shall keep that under continuing review. If it proves necessary to make a change, we shall make a change, but I do not think that there is any need for that at present.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): Does my right hon. friend agree that many of the 70 recommendations in the report are significant in terms of constitutional change, investigatory powers and monitoring? The question for the Government must be whether they can be accommodated from the inside by simple changes of rules within the council, or whether they should be introduced from outside by some means or another. It has always been the view of many of us that it would be wholly improper for this matter to be part of the Financial Services Act. However, will he ensure that he does not close the door on the possibility of introducing changes by a public or private Bill, as many of us still feel that that would restore and enhance the respectability and confidence of both policyholders and members of Lloyd's?

Mr. Channon: I do not close off any possibility at present, and I shall bear my hon. Friend's views in mind. However, I am anxious to proceed with some speed and if that can be done without legislation, which is bound to cause delay, we shall be able to act much more quickly. I want to see investor protection. I agree with what the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) said about comparability with the SIB. We all want comparable investor protection to be achieved at the earliest possible moment and that is what we shall work for.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Is it correct that one of the reasons for appointing the committee with its limited terms of reference was to take minutes and waste years and thus fob off the possibility of regulation under the Financial Services Act? Further, is it correct that the wish of the chairman was for a similar framework of regulation for Lloyd's but that he was overruled by the other two members? Is it also correct to say that in wanting comparable arrangements for Lloyd's the committee has conceded the case for regulation under the Financial Services Act, and should not the Secretary of State's proper course now be to rewrite that Act, put it on a statutory basis, and bring Lloyd's within it?

Mr. Channon: I do not agree with anything that the hon. Gentleman says. There is no evidence of the chairman being in a minority, but he can speak for himself. I have no evidence that what the hon. Gentleman says bears any relation to the truth——

Mr. Skinner: The right hon. Gentleman is in a minority.

Mr. Channon: I am not in a minority.

Mr. Skinner: Yes—even in the Cabinet.

Mr. Channon: No, I am in a strong majority, and strong majority of hon. Members is in favour of the repo

The committee was not set up to waste a lot of time. has reported reasonably quickly and we shall take actio quickly.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is another statement follow but I shall call those hon. Members who a standing, but I ask them to put their quesions briefly.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): My right ho Friend has stressed the importance of speed in this and t House will welcome that, particularly in view of the la of action so far in prosecuting the perpetrators of the ma scandals that have bedevilled Lloyd's over the past fe years. Therefore, will my right hon. Friend help the Hou a little more by saying how fast he would like Lloyd's act and whether he would expect some action within s or 12 months, or when?

Mr. Channon: I want to have urgent talks with Lloyd and to be in a position shortly to come back to the Hou with an agreed timetable for action. I hope that that wi happen shortly and I shall keep my hon. Friend in touc

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): If Lloyd's is to be place on an equal footing with self-regulating organisatio under the Financial Services Act, my right hon. Friend t Secretary of State must inevitably have the same powe as the Securities and Investment Board already has und the Act. I understood my right hon. Friend to say tha Neill had recommended no addition to the Secretary State's powers. Can he confirm that he already has t same powers to interfere in the affairs of Lloyd's as the SI has to interfere in the affairs of SROs?

Mr. Channon: What I have are powers under t Companies Acts and under the insurance regulatory Ac to deal with the affairs of Lloyd's. There have been number of investigations into groups at Lloyd's in the pa and I believe that I have the necessary powers in that are I also believe that we can now work together—I hop that I am right in thinking that there will not be substanti disagreement between the various parts of the House so that we can agree a timetable for action on the repo so that we shall see progress shortly.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West) Will my right hon. Friend remind Lloyd's that it ha conducted a public discussion about how it can institu self-regulation at least since the Fisher report in 1980, an within the next year will he tell it that either it does the jo itself and does it properly or else Parliament will legislat

Mr. Channon: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): I welcome th Government's decision to set up the inquiry, and the mai conclusions of the report, as steps towards th maintenance of public confidence in Lloyd's, which i after all, an important earner of overseas exchange. Woul not an even more important step towards rebuilding tha confidence be the early prosecution, and preferabl conviction, of those wrongdoers whose notorious, and a yet unpunished, activities remain a source of considerabl public concern?

Mr. Channon: Yes, I understand and share my hon Friend's view about that matter. I have already said tha

I shall draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General to what has been said in the House. This is a matter for the Director of Public Prosecutions and I shall draw his attention to that.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): How does my right hon. Friend square the idea of a compensation fund for investors with the traditional unlimited personal liability of names at Lloyd's?

Mr. Channon: That is something to be discussed by Lloyd's. It is a suggestion in the report. I am not accepting every detail of the report today. I am saying that, so far as I can judge, it is an acceptable basis for discussion with Lloyd's so that there can be an urgent review and a timetable drawn up on how to proceed. That will be among the matters which I shall wish to discuss with Lloyd's and I would welcome my hon. Friend's views on the topic.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): Will my right hon. Friend accept that those of us who sat on the Committee that considered on the Lloyd's Bill believe that there is a need to be consistent in the House? We should bear in mind that the House came to the view that the case for self-regulation was powerful. Speaking as a name, I am bound to say that the report points the way forward.

Mr. Channon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I think that in broad terms I share his views and I shall certainly bear them in mind.

Maternity and Funeral Payments

4.25 pm

The Minister for Social Security and the Disabled (Mr. John Major): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about a technical defect which has emerged in part III of the 1986 Social Security Act.

The Act introduces, among other things, a social fund to provide better targeted help with exceptional expenses to people on low incomes. Most payments from the fund will start in April 1988, but, as the House knows, we intend help with maternity and funeral costs to begin in April 1987. These payments will replace the universal maternity and death grants, and the existing supplementary benefit single payments for maternity needs and funeral expenses.

The Government's clearly stated intention has always been that the social fund maternity payment should be a flat-rate sum, and that the reasonable specified costs of a funeral would be met from the social fund. We always intended to define not only those low income groups eligible for such payments, but also the amounts payable. Those intentions were recognised in debates here and in another place during the passage of the Social Security Act.

The Social Fund Maternity and Funeral Expenses (General) Regulations 1986 were laid last month to give expression to that policy. It is now clear, following consideration of the regulations by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, that there is a defect in the primary legislation. This is because the Act gives powers to prescribe the "circumstances" in which maternity and funeral payments may be made but does not provide, as had previously been understood, a specific power to prescribe the amount of such payments.

We propose to correct this defect immediately and shall introduce a short amending Bill to the House tomorrow. In the meantime we shall revoke the general regulations and intend, subject to the agreement of Parliament, to make and lay a fresh set under the powers to be provided by the proposed amending Bill. These will enable the new arrangements for help with maternity and funeral costs to be implemented as intended from April this year. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland will be making corresponding provision. Our policy of directing help where it is needed most is clearly right and we intend to carry it through.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): Is the Minister aware that this blunder over the regulations, together with the current debacle over the Local Government Finance Bill, is the second time this week that the Government have demonstrated crass incompetence in the pursuit of highly objectionable legislation? Is he aware that, after his climbdown over cold weather payments, this is his second apology to the House within three days, and, after the shambles of repeated court action over the illegal board and lodging regulations, it only enhances the Government's growing reputation for bungling ineptitude in the handling of their business?

Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the botch-up has occurred only because the Government were so impatient to vote down thoroughly reasonable amendments in another place on the rights of independent appeal from social fund decisions, so reckless in forcing through the Bill in the last hours before the summer recess, that in their indecent haste they rushed the drafting?

[Mr. Michael Meacher]

Is the hon. Gentleman aware that it is only because the Government are so anxious to reduce expenditure by £200 million a year on single payments such as funeral and maternity expenses, which are so essential to pensioners and poor families, that Ministers are embarrassed by this legislative gap which would otherwise prevent them from cutting payments to the poor?

How can the Government claim to believe in the family when they are going to such lengths to replace grants by means-tested loans for maternity and funeral expenses? Even more important, what is the morality of abolishing at a stroke the death grant, which is an insurance benefit for which people have paid all their lives? Is the Minister aware that, by insisting on taking powers to cut funeral payments to pensioners and others, he is forcing more and more of them to build up savings for their funerals and thus disqualify themselves from cold weather payments because their savings exceed £500?

Is the Minister aware that, instead of insisting on further legislation to enforce cash-limiting the relief of poverty, the Government ought to be taking action to reduce poverty, which has doubled under their regime until it now involves more than 10 million households?

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman has somewhat overplayed what has happened. I fear that he is being characteristically pedantic. We are discussing an error, I concede that, but it is a technical error and is in no sense a policy change. It is regrettable that there is an error, but it is most certainly not unprecedented. It may have happened under many other Administrations and may happen under future Administrations, whoever are in government.

The hon. Gentleman should not be so critical of mistakes because he rarely gets anything right himself. This provision targets help more directly on the people whom we believe most need it and we believe that judgment to be correct. As for means-tested loans, the hon. Gentleman will be aware that the change to which we are referring established a regulatory system for maternity and funeral payments that will be of particular help to people on low incomes.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): I regret the legislative slippage to which my hon. Friend the Minister has referred. Does he accept that the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) is wrong in maintaining that the way forward is to maintain small and largely meaningless payments of death grants? Is my hon. Friend aware that most Conservative Members endorse the policy that the Government introduced into legislation last year, under which much more substantial assistance is paid where need exists and that, notwithstanding the delay, he is heading in the right direction and should not be deterred?

Mr. Major: I am grateful to my hon. Friend; he is right. We propose to correct the defects and proceed with the policy that we enunciated some time ago. If the hon. Member for Oldham, West believes that the present system is so inadequate, it is surprising that the last Labour Government did not upgrade the death grant or the maternity grant.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I express to the Minister my sympathy on the onset of a political condition that the doctors call Ridleyism. that it proves not to be terminal. As he is now lo again at the death grant and proposes to us regulations to correct this fault, would it not be sensible to increase substantially the value of the grant as presently constituted but make that reclaimable from the estate of the deceased — MEMBERS: "No."] Yes. The money would therefo targeted on those most in need and give more subst help to them.

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman has shown th may have misunderstood the policy. We are conc with targeting funeral assistance most appropriately people in greatest need. I believe that it is possi proceed in the fashion suggested by the hon. Gent under the provisions before us.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-W Although one regrets this error, would my hon. F keep the matter in perspective? The death grant of £ become almost meaningless when funerals cost s hundred pounds. Neither grant has been upgrade nearly 20 years. It is extremely important to give re help to those in genuine need.

Mr. Major: My hon. Friend is entirely right whe describes most acutely the policy that we have enun and propose to follow.

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): Since low weigh term babies are likely to be handicapped and this c forecast, and since there will be flexibility in the sy will the Minister give increased maternity gran mothers at risk of producing disabled babies?

Mr. Major: The proposition is for a flat rate mat grant, which I announced some days ago, of £80 in re of the groups who qualify. The underlying propo about which the hon. Gentleman is concerned is me number of ways in social security and social se legislation but is not particularly appropriate to the ci of the sort that I believe he has in mind.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Surely we all wa ensure that resources are directed to those most in n the most appropriate quantities. Is that not what th is designed to do? Is not the hon. Member for Old West (Mr. Meacher) making a mountain out of a mo

Mr. Major: My hon. Friend is precisely right on counts.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penist Does the Minister not realise that his stateme regrettable in that seeking to put right what is wrong to be the Government's classic disease in their legisla The words used by the Minister — "targeting" "guiding towards those on low pay" — are em words to give an impression of compassion and effici when this is only a major rescheduling of money fro poor to the poorer still and is taking money out o welfare state.

Mr. Major: The hon. Member might like to be mind the substantial increase in directly targeted he those people on relatively low or very low incomes believe that that policy is correct and we shall purs Insofar as we can target the help most adequately in direction, we can deliver a greater measure of help would otherwise be the case.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Does not my right hon. Friend find it remarkable that the one complaint that can be made here is in relation to a purely technical error on the part of a draftsman which now has to be corrected? Instead of addressing himself to that problem, the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) harks back to a time when tiny death grants were dished out to people who for the most part, did not need them, instead of looking forward to a time when help is going to be targeted to those who most need it.

Mr. Major: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those remarks. Ministers must accept responsibility for the error in the Bill. We are content to do that and to correct it without delay.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): Are not the Government likely to keep landing in the cart, making errors and over-taxing the law people, civil servants and draftsmen with their proposed revolutionary changes, tearing up the Beveridge report, as they are consistently doing with the death grant and insurance right? Why does not the Minister try to return to the real core of traditional Toryism, that of gradualistic change, instead of bringing in these revolutionary measures?

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman is exceedingly tempting. I shall confine myself to saying that, after 40 years, there is general agreement, whatever differences exist, that a substantial number of changes are required in the social security system.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Will my hon. Friend go back to his Department and tell his draftsmen that the House of Commons is getting fed up with these errors, that, if they cannot get it right, they need not expect their CBEs in the Honours List and that we would rather put the work out to contract?

Mr. Major: My hon. Friend is characteristically forthright, but I must reiterate two points. First, the error arose as a result of an attempt to reflect quickly the will of the other place. Secondly, when a Bill is presented to Parliament, the Minister is responsible for any mistake.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): Although the Minister generously accepts responsibility for the follies and foolishness of his lawyers, does he not think that it is time that the DHSS sacked the lot of them and exposed them to the market economy for failure to deal with the job that they have been given? More to the point, since we are talking about general expenses, is it not time that the Minister relaxed the £500 capital disregard in relation to grants made for fuel allowances? It is unacceptable to the House that that should remain in force unadjusted while we are moving into the new system.

Mr. Major: Although I understand that the hon. Gentleman would not have meant it personally, he is being very unfair to the many lawyers who worked on the Social Security Bill it was a substantial, difficult and technical Bill to carry through. I regret the fact that this error has occurred, but it has. Insofar as the £500 capital limit is concerned, I can add nothing to what I had to say on Tuesday.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, during the past half hour, we have seen the two sides of the ugly face of Toryism? The Neill report was treated with disdain by Ministers after a £100 million swindle at Lloyd's in the City. Now another junior Minister has come along to tell us that a mistake has been made, and he does not have the decency to allocate a proper funeral allowance without applying the means test, despite calls from both sides of the House for such an allowance. It is no wonder that Lubbock's body is going to the dogs.

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman is being characteristically obnoxious. Frankly, he needs a verbal straitjacket.

Mr. Skinner: Even your vocabulary is not very good.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I am just waiting for my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) to finish.

I am intrigued that the Minister should come to the Dispatch Box and accept ministerial responsibility for this mistake. This is in stark contrast to the attitude of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, who came to the Dispatch Box and tried to share the blame among a range of people—in fact, to put the blame on anyone but himself. Will the Minister tell the House who spotted the mistake?

Mr. Major: That is clear from my statement. It arose as a result of the consideration of regulations made under the primary legislation by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments.

BALLOT FOR NOTICES OF MOTIONS FOR MONDAY 9 FEBRUARY

Members successful in the ballot were:

Mr. Michael Brown
Mr. Peter Pike
Mr. Sydney Chapman.

BILLS PRESENTED

Rate Support Grants

Mr. Secretary Ridley, supported by Mr. Secretary Hurd, Mr. Secretary Edwards, Mr. John MacGregor and Dr. Rhodes Boyson, presented a Bill to make further provision as to the calculation of entitlement to block grant under Part VI of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 53.]

Social Security (Cold Climate Allowance)

Mr. Gordon Wilson, supported by Mr. Dafydd Wigley, Mr. Donald Stewart and Mr. D. E. Thomas, presented a Bill to provide for more equitable heating allowances to reflect the increased costs of domestic heating in colder climates; and for purposes connected therewith: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 24 April and to be printed. [Bill 51.]

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Motion made,

That the Cardiff Bay Development Corporation (Area and Constitution) Order 1987 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c. — [Mr. Lighthown.]

Mr. Walter Harrison (Wakefield): No.

Mr. Speaker: Has the right hon. Member the support of 20 hon. Members?

Mr. Harrison: Last night, unsolicited, there were 171 hon. Members in support of the first vote that I called and 10 in support of the second. That is an average of 90·5. I am certain that I shall get 20 supporters, so I say no.

Mr. Speaker: I shall put the Question.

Royal Air Force

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

4.52 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Archie Hamilton): This is the first Royal Air Force debate that I have had the privilege to open. It is an especial privilege in this the 75th anniversary year of the founding of the RAF's precursor, the Royal Flying Corps. From those early days the RAF has played a crucial role in the defence of the nation. Today the RAF is one of the best equipped and most professional air forces in the world. It can project awesome air power in all its forms, wherever and however it may be ordered to do. The House well knows the importance of air power. The German blitzkrieg campaigns of 1940 and 1941, the Battle of Britain, Pearl Harbour, and, more recently, the Arab-Israeli wars and the Falklands conflict have all demonstrated the essential prerequisite of air superiority if other battles are to be fought and won.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): The Minister mentioned the Falklands conflict. On several occasions some of my colleagues and I have asked the Ministry of Defence to tell us about the deployment of naval and air forces, as well as personnel, in the south Atlantic. We are always told that we cannot be informed of that because it is a matter of national security. Does the Minister believe that the deployment of our forces is unknown to Argentina and to the Soviets, or to whoever else wants to find that out? Why is it that the only people who are not told how much deployment there is in the south Atlantic and what we are getting for the huge sums that are being spent there—the only people who are left totally in the dark — are the British Parliament and the British taxpayers, who must foot the Bill? Why can we not be told what we must clearly expect our enemies to have information about? Why can we not be told what the deployment is in the south Atlantic?

Mr. Hamilton: I cannot speculate on how good the Argentine intelligence services are, but it must be right to keep secret exactly what our deployments are, because we are trying to deter any future adventurism in that area. Therefore, the less specific we are about our troops and deployment there, the better.

Land and sea forces are naked without air cover and can rarely complete their tasks without air superiority. That point is not lost on the Soviet Union, whose defence expenditure, huge as it is, has been focussed in this direction, with the introduction in the past decade of the Foxbat, Fencer, Flogger, Fulcrum and Flanker fighters, The Backfire and Blackjack heavy bombers and its own AWACS, the Mainstay airborne early warning aircraft.

During our debate on the Army last week the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), accused my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces of fearing to look forward. The accusation was quite unjustified. We do not pretend that maintaining an effective, credible and balanced defence within reasonable resources is easy, but it is much easier for us than it would ever be for the Labour party, bearing in mind the increasing influence of the hard Left.

I look back gladly on the substantial increase in expenditure in real terms which we have achieved in the last eight years and which has given the RAF its biggest re-equipment programme for 30 years, with the build-up of the Tornado GR1 force nearing completion, the Tornado F3 entering service and the Harrier GR5 to follow shortly.

Those and other systems, which I shall describe, will provide the backbone of our air power as it enters the next decade. Range of operations, mobility and speed of response define the key characteristics in each of the major roles which the RAF undertakes. Modern attack aircraft, such as the Tornado, can carry a wide range of weapons by day or by night and in all weathers, and can even perform two or more different roles in the course of a single mission. Their range of action can be extended by in-flight refuelling and they can be re-targeted in the air. Air transport is vital for reinforcement both within the tactical environment and strategically. For example, Mount Pleasant airport now gives us the ability to reinforce the Falklands by air in a matter of hours.

Now I shall address some aspects of Britain's air power in greater detail. I shall deal first with air defence, which is air power in its own right, and our protection against the air power of any potential aggressor. Air defence of the United Kingdom not only secures the protection of our national territory, but plays a vital role in NATO'S ability to defend western Europe from any attack by Warsaw pact countries. The United Kingdom provides a forward base for maritime operations in the north-east Atlantic and north Norwegian sea, a rear base for operations on and over continental Europe, and a main operating base for maritime operations in the Channel and eastern Atlantic. The United Kingdom would play a crucial role in any conflict as a staging post for reinforcements from North America. The RAF's air defence capability will greatly increase in key areas during the next few years.

One hundred and sixty-two of the air defence variant of the Tornado have now been ordered. In 1985 the operational conversion unit was formed to train pilots on the new F3, and the first squadron will become fully operational later this year. Thereafter, squadrons will form every six months until 1990. The F3's excellent range and loiter capability—which can be extended by air-to-air refuelling—is ideally suited to the role of air defence of the United Kingdom because it allows us to fly long combat air patrols far out of the North and Norwegian seas and the Atlantic to intercept enemy aircraft before they can launch long-range missiles.

I have to acknowledge that some difficulties have been experienced with the development of the F3's sophisticated airintervention radar, Foxhunter, which does not yet meet the requirements of the RAF in full. However, I am glad to say that we are defining a programme of work with the contractor to pursue a resolution of the problems and the achievement of an acceptable standard for the radar.

There is no dispute that airborne early warning is an essential component of air defence. In the jargon beloved of the Ministry of Defence it is a "force multiplier", which allows the best use of the resources at our disposal. It can evaluate threats over a wide area and direct fighters to where they are most needed. As the Warsaw pact develops its capability for operations at low level, including its deployment of cruise missiles, so the ability of the AEW aircraft to look down on and detect potential targets becomes more and more important. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said to the House last month, the need to have absolute confidence in the system adopted to fulfil this crucial role was central to the Government's difficult decision to select the Boeing E3A rather than the Nimrod system.

The third key improvement is in the area of radar systems and command and control of the air defence battle on the ground. The House will not be surprised to know that the Ministry of Defence has yet another acronym for this, but it is the ugliest of them all: the United Kingdom air defence ground environment—known as UKADGE. It gathers information primarily from a chain of ground radars and from AEW aircraft and enables RAF controllers to direct out interceptors towards enemy aircraft or cruise missiles. Installation of the improved UKADGE is continuing well. Six new transportable radars have now been delivered and preparation of new command and control systems is under way. This represents the most radical improvement to UKADGE since the early 1960s, and will provide the United Kingdom with a sophisticated automated system in which the computing capability of a single new radar control console will exceed the entire capability of the old system.

For some time now the RAF has been a leading exponent of air-to-air refuelling techniques. The Falklands conflict underscored the value of air-to-air refuelling both to extend the range of an aircraft and to increase its loiter time. It is another important force multiplier.

Since 1982 we have introduced a squadron of VC10s and purchased six ex-British Airways TriStars, of which the first three are in service. As a result we were able to disband one of the two remaining squadrons of Victor tankers in June last year. We plan to replace the remaining Victor squadron with a further five VC10s and three converted TriStars in the 1990s. The TriStar is particularly effective because it offers a vastly increased fuel capacity and long range, and can carry fuel, passengers or freight. This new fleet will enable the RAF to support its refuelling requirement well into the next century.

In NATO's central region the fundamental requirement is for mobility, both in the air and on the ground, in order to concentrate firepower quickly and to counter-attack in depth so that the momentum of a Soviet attack can be broken.

This is the key to the new concept of operations for Northern Army Group, of which BAOR is part. It is described in page 33 of last year's "Statement on the Defence Estimates", which the right hon. Member for Llanelli seems to have missed when he accused us last week of having forces

"pinned down in a linear forward defence." — [Official Report, 13 January 1987; Vol. 108, c. 183.]

The right hon. Gentleman confuses NATO's strategy of forward defence with the tactical conduct of the battle.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): The Minister will recognise that the role of the helicopter is vital in this context and I wish to press him on two matters relating to that. First, he has said that a decision is pending on future helicopter policy. Can he be more specific about that, bearing in mind how eagerly the decision is awaited in Yeovil by Westland? Secondly, does he recognise that if he gives in to a temptation to drip feed orders for helicopters he will not meet the needs of our armed forces in the central plain of Europe and he could do enormous potential damage to the integrity of the Westland work force and the technologies required to support that?

Mr. Hamilton: I recognise the interest o

Mr. Ashdown: The Minister will be aware that Sir John Cuckney has told the Government of the extreme importance to Westland, in order to maintain the integrity of the work force and its ability to meet the future needs of the EH101 productions, of making the decision before March. Will the Minister at least assure the House that the Government have registered that request and intend to provide a decision at last by that date?

Mr. Hamilton: We recognise the urgency of the position for Westland and I hope that a decision will be made by March.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): These decisions normally impact on more than one service at a time. Can my hon. Friend tell the House what the Government's current assessment is of the viability and effectiveness of the helicopter in a tank-busting role? We hear a great deal about investment in tanks. I wonder how much we shall invest in tanks in future, and how much in helicopters.

Mr. Hamilton: I am well aware of my hon. Friend's interest in the balance between helicopters and tanks, and this is being considered and reviewed continually. I do not believe that we are seriously entertaining a proposal that the balance should be much changed. It is unlikely that we shall see a great disbandment of tank regiments. We must bear in mind that the Soviet Union has a vast number of tanks in the Warsaw pact.

I now turn to maritime operations, in which air power is essential to the efforts of the Royal Navy and our NATO allies in the Atlantic battles to defend vital sea lines of communications and in the forward battles in the Norwegian sea. Shore-based aircraft with rapid reaction times, a long range air-to-air refuelling and the ability to locate, track and attack both surface ships and submarines all contribute.

The name Nimrod is now firmly linked in the public mind with the AEW project, but we must remember that the original Nimrod is the long-range maritime patrol version, which is one of the world's best anti-submarine aircraft. In 1986 the modification of the RAF's force of four squadrons to mark 2 standard was completed, giving them an effective capability through to the mid-1990s.

I am pleased to report that it is not only tornado crews who win prizes, as a Nimrod from 120 squadron won this year's Fincastle trophy, held in southern Australia. The competition, between maritime patrol aircraft of the RAF and Canadian, Australian and New Zealand air forces, consists of day and night sorties against a target submarine. The Nimrod crew were clear winners and were the only competitors to carry out successful attacks in both missions.

Turning now from the theory of air power to the practice, one of the high points in RAF training this year was Exercise Saif Sareea—Swift Sword.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Before my hon. Friend embarks on that interesting adventure, will he say whether studies have been undertaken by the Ministry to convert the old air frames of Nimrod mark 3—presumably they will now be surplus—into badly needed additional mark 2s for maritime patrol aircraft?

Mr. Hamilton: The existing surplus Nimrods will almost certainly be used as a back-up for the maritime, reconnaissance role, but there are 11 of them, and I do not think they will all be used for that purpose.

Exercise Saif Sareea was an out-of-area joint force field training exercise held in Oman, in conjunction with the Sultan of Oman's armed forces, during the period 16 November to 8 December 1986. It was the first major venture of its kind mounted since the Falklands operation and was designed to demonstrate the United Kingdom's capability for rapid deployment overseas and joint operations with the host nation. The Royal Air Force contributed Tornados, tankers and air transport aircraft. Royal Air Force history was made when a fully loaded VC-10 passenger transport aircraft refuelled in mid-air from a VC-10 tanker en route to Oman, which it reached after a non-stop flight.

The exercise also illustrated the dual transport-tanker capability of the RAF's new TriStar aircraft. Supported by TriStars and VC-10 aircraft in the tanker role, four Tornado GR1 and two Tornado F3 aircraft deployed from the United Kingdom to Masirah in a non-stop flight of over 10 hours and were airborne again on a combat mission within 35 minutes of landing there—a striking testament to Britain's ability to project its airpower. During the exercise, Tornados flew 40 representative sorties in Oman, including a demonstration airfield attack, and Hercules aircraft completed 80 sorties in support of 5 Airborne Brigade, including a formation air drop of 443 paratroops from seven aircraft, including an Omani Hercules.

Visitors to the exercise included my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, the Chief of Defence Staff, the Air Officer Commanding-in-Chief Strike Command and hon. Members from the Select Committee on Defence. This exercise exceeded expectations in all areas, not least in the degree of combined and joint co-operation that had been achieved. The exercise also demonstrated convincingly the speed and efficiency with which, given a secure airfield and host nation support, the United Kingdom is able to put a sizeable force into a remote theatre through airpower. I am sure that those hon. Members who were able to observe parts of this exercise will wish to join me in recognising its success and to congratulate all concerned.

Mr. John Ward (Poole): Will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to pay tribute to the dedication, skill and indeed co-operation of the Omani forces which took part in this exercise?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes, indeed. I pay great tribute to the Omani forces. I know that the exercise could not have been a success without their co-operation.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): I was interested to hear my hon. Friend's comments, and the success of that operation is beyond doubt. Is the Ministry aware of the need for futher exercises in that part of the world, where there is so much tension, and where British troops would always be welcome?

Mr. Hamilton: We are aware that many of our friends in that region were very impressed by this exercise, and I am sure that they would like other exercises to take place there in the future.

To be effective, the Royal Air Force has to fly and fight on the leading edge of technology. Looking forward then, the next major aircraft requirement is for a replacement for Phantoms and some Jaguars, which we intend to fill with the European fighter aircraft, or EFA. Warsaw pact aircraft coming into service from now and through the 1990s are expected to be much more manoeuvrable than existing types. EFA is intended to be a highly agile combat aircraft, optimised for gaining local air superiority against enemy fighters, but also possessing a good air-to-ground attack capability, where its agility will help it to avoid enemy defences.

Project definition for EFA was completed in September and we and our partners signed the general memorandum of understanding. We are all currently evaluating the outcome of the definition phase and have agreed a short period of further work to refine the design and prepare the ground for full development that is planned to be launched later this year, subject to national approval procedures.

Weapons as well as aircraft must keep pace with new threats. The next generation of air-to-air missile must also be capable of locking on to and destroying highly manoeuvrable targets at greater ranges than today. The United Kingdom, Germany and France have signed a memorandum of understanding with the United States whereby the European signatories, together with Norway, are to develop an advanced short range air-to-air missile ASRAAM, while the United States is developing an advanced medium range air-to-air missile AMRAAM.

Both missiles will be "fire and forget", and aircraft carrying them will be able to engage several targets at the same time. The military advantages are obvious. The ASRAAM-AMRAAM "family of weapons" agreement is another example of the way in which members of the Alliance are striving to obtain maximum value from their defence resources by avoiding the duplication of expensive development work.

In the year since the House last debated the Royal Air Force, the importance and flexibility of air power has continued to be demonstrated in practical operations. Only last week the RAF provided desperately needed helicopter flights to move the sick and the injured through the worst weather this country has seen in recent years.

The United Kingdom is not the only place where such help has been rendered. The House will, of course, recall the magnificent efforts of the RAF in Ethiopia, where it won the admiration of the world. Less publicly but no less important, the RAF ferried equipment, medical supplies and medical teams in El Salvador following the disastrous earthquake there. In June, Puma helicopters from Belize, together with a Hercules, carrying relief supplies arrived in Jamaica to help in the mopping-up operation after the serious flooding which followed two weeks of rain.

Nearer home again, the RAF search and rescue force continued to provide invaluable safety cover. I will mention just two examples showing the ability to project this capability at considerable distance from base. In November, RAF Sea Kings rescued the 28-man crew of the Kowloon Bridge, which eventually sank off the coast of south-west Ireland, hundreds of miles from their base in Wales. Despite the fact that the call for help was made at midnight, and in a force 11 gale, the rescue was made within two hours. On Christmas day a Nimrod found the survivors of the Icelandic freighter Sudurland in a water-logged lifeboat and dropped them a survival kit which included a new lifeboat and almost certainly saved their lives. Again this was done hundreds of the case with the Hawk.

The tour was an unqualified success and strengthened the RAF's relations abroad through the superb flying displays, which we have come to expect from the Red Arrows, and the professionalism of the team members and their support crew. The tour also enhanced the prestige of our aerospace industry and improved the prospects of further sales of the Hawk.

There can be no doubt that, like the Red Arrows, Britain's aerospace industry is one of our great success stories. The Rapier missile system operated by both the RAF and the Army has won over £2 billion-worth of overseas orders. The RAF's Hawk trainer is already in service with, or ordered by, many air forces across the world. As recently as last week hon. Members will have seen press reports that the Swiss Defence Ministry has selected the Hawk for its advanced jet trainer requirement, after a direct competition with the Franco-German Alpha jet.

The Swiss were impressed by the technical and operational advantages of the Hawk and the competitive terms which British industry were able to offer. This is a classic example of how to succeed abroad—the right equipment, coupled with the right marketing, and the strong support of the Government. Hawk also cracked the hardest market of all when it was selected by the United States Navy. Given the strength of the indigenous defence industry in the United States, this is a highly significant achievement.

Sir Anthony Buck (Colchester, North): Can my hon. Friend tell us about the prospects for sales of Hawk to Venezuela? They were lined up, but there was a period of desuetude during the Falklands crisis. I understand that there is a substantial chance of sales being revamped. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces can give a reply in his winding-up speech.

Mr. Hamilton: I shall refer that question to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces.

The outstanding success of recent years has undoubtedly been the sale of Tornado. The House will recall that Tornado forms part of our biggest-ever export deal. On current estimates, the sale to Saudi Arabia is worth at least £5 billion. The Ministry of Defence, the RAF and a number of members of the Government, not least my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister herself, have worked hard to secure that deal. It will bring 9,000 extra jobs directly to workers at British Aerospace at Warton, Brough, Kengston and Dunsfold, and indirectly to sub-contractors over the country, and, of course, there will be substantial benefits to the balance of payments.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): Will my hon. Friend confirm that, even if one excludes that magnificent deal involving the sale of aircraft to Saudi Arabia, defence sales in the aerospace industry last year were as high as they have ever been?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes. Sales in the aerospace industry are running high, as are sales of other defence equipment. Such sales are an important part of British industry and our export performance.

I would have hoped that all hon. Members would welcome the Saudi deal as good news for Britain, but it seems that some in the Labour party are not enthusiastic. The document, "Statements by the National Executive Committee" produced for Labour's last party conference, seemed to take a jaundiced view of the sale. It said:

> "Even the massive £5,000 million deal to export military aircraft to Saudi Arabia, apparently agreed earlier this year, now appears to be in jeopardy."

I hope that the Opposition will now give unqualified support to the Saudi deal and welcome the fact that it is not in jeopardy.

As for future sales of Tornado, the exceptional performance of the aircraft has attracted the interest of a number of other countries, which can expect their inquiries to be met by enthusiasm and co-operation from a Conservative Government.

Regrettably, I have to tell the House that such sales might fall foul of a Socialist Government. The 1986 statement by the National Executive Committee makes it clear that the Labour party expects > "inevitably a major reduction in Britain's current arms sales".

Labour also expects to diversify the jobs of those in the industries involved into > "products vitally needed in Third world countries".

How somebody involved in the manufacture of guided missiles can start to make ploughshares I do not know, but that is the proposal.

In addition, there is a proposal to abolish the Defence Export Services Organisation, which has done much to promote Britain's defence industry abroad and help our defence manufacturers to clinch orders in the face of ruthless foreign competition. Such a policy would certainly increase the prices which our own armed forces would have to pay for equipment, by shortening production runs and discouraging private venture development. More important than that, I hope that the Labour party will not shirk its responsibilities and will make it clear to the electorate that its proposals for defence export sales will undermine the job security of many of the 120,000 British workers who depend on the export of defence equipment for their livelihood.

The House will need no reminding of that extraordinary moment in our history when our very survival depended on the men and machines of the RAF in the battle of Britain. I am confident that if we called upon them today, the men of the RAF would display the same courage and dedication as their predecessors. However, 1940 was also characterised by an overwhelming political will—a will to survive and a will to win. By its unilateralist defence policies and its inevitable commitment to a neutralist Britain—in every way—the Labour party of today demonstrates that it does not have the will to fight to defend Britain whereas, by contrast, this Government have demonstrated that they have. Not only that, but—as I hope I have shown today—they have given, and will continue to give, the RAF the backing it needs to do its job today and tomorrow. The Opposition have chosen to ignore what the Government have actually achieved through the years of real growth of resources since 1979. That expenditure has not vanished; the benefits which it has brought are there to be seen today in improved equipment and improved morale in all the services.

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): The hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) and I fought a long battle in the House to get the EFA off the ground by 1991. We both said that although we had the Spitfire and the Hurricane, we did not have enough of them when they were needed.

[Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones]

That was the problem at that time. If the EFA programme is allowed to slip any more, our good pilots will not have the aircraft at the appropriate time, which is 1995. Will the Minister address himself to that? Secondly, will he kindly deal with an omission? We applaud the airframe, but he has left out the RB199, which will play a significant role in future.

Mr. Hamilton: I fully accept the value of the RB199 and also the need for the RAF to have the EFA. I paid great tribute to that earlier.

The Labour party offers instead a declared intention to abandon our strategic guarantee and to rip out of NATO the theatre nuclear weapons which are essential if we are to have available the full range of weaponry to deter potential aggressors. Labour has made it clear that it wishes to cut our defence expenditure as a proportion of GDP by about a third. It is incredible that the Labour party does not plan on the basis of what Britain and NATO need to meet the threat. Instead, Labour plucks an arbitrary figure out of the air—the average of our major European allies spending as a proportion of national income. We know what that will mean — real defence cuts year after year.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): As the Minister has made the point about the nuclear deterrent in the British area, will he tell the House which nuclear weapons are in the possession and control of British first call? Which can be used simply under the direction of British first call or by the Royal Air Force on the central front? Can he tell us whether, in fact, we have control of those weapons?

Mr. Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman knows well that we do not release that sort of information.

Even the most impressive capability in the world has little value without the will to use it. The Labour party does not have that will; nor does it have any likelihood of delivering the resources that our armed forces need; nor does it even show any understanding of what defence in the nuclear age really demands.

The electorate knows that the Labour party of today cannot be trusted with the defence of the realm. The Government have demonstrated by their actions that when it comes to resources, political will and maintaining the morale of our armed forces, there is no contest.

5.32 pm

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): After that withering attack upon the Labour party's defence policies, I almost get the whiff of electoral grapeshot in the air, but coming from the Under-Secretary, it was more like a grapefruit.

I should like to join the Minister in paying tribute to the work of the Royal Air Force and in particular in recent weeks to the work of the helicopter crews. Those of us who represent coastal constituencies have become used to, and almost take for granted, the fact that, whenever there is an accident or incident at sea, the RAF will be on the scene to rescue holidaymakers or ships' crews from danger. Over the past few weeks we have seen examples of the courage and skill of helicopter crews flying in hazardous, arctic conditions. We should recognise and pay tribute to them, and I join the hon. Gentleman in doing so.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North) Gentleman will remember the re mountainous areas who every wint appalling conditions that were com of the United Kingdom recently. Ev to get help from the rescue squadron us.

Mr. McNamara: I agree with the I said, sometimes we almost take th Under-Secretary drew attention to heroism. We echo his support and involved.

The latest fig number of officers and men volunta services early rose by one fifth, to 6,30 December 1985 compared with the c in 1984.

Service men are not happy. The disapproval in the only way they ca without trade unions; they are votin leaving the services. Mr. Bill Walker: Perhaps the ho care to examine carefully how thos position within the civil aircraft oper ever been thus. In all the years that has had a problem, it has always occ airlines have themselves been short o poach from the Royal Air Force, successfully. The real answer is to re in a volunteer or auxiliary capacity s not lose them.

Mr. McNamara: I take on bo Gentleman has said; I was just comi with the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) that we must have some way of keeping these people in an auxiliary or reserve air force. I am sure that could be done. It happens frequently. For example, in the United States most of the airline pilots are members of the national guard. We could have a similar system. We know that at the moment British Airways alone wants 100 qualified pilots.

If the RAF wants to keep its pilots and navigators, the Ministry of Defence will have to do something to make it more attractive for them to stay. The local overseas allowance for forces stationed in Germany will have to be re-examined. The Ministry might consider offering its aircrew a retention bonus, which is what the Australians are doing to solve their shortage of pilots. It might do something about the RAF married quarters, 70 per cent. of which are in a lamentable state.

We know that the Ministry has at last started to look at the problem. Air Vice Marshal Bobby Robson has been given this task. I hope that he is successful, but I understand that his last duties were as a public relations man. Public relations are not what is needed. What is needed is a positive reassessment of the role of the pilots, their value and the need to retain them within the service. Not enough urgency is being attached to this problem, which we have been raising over the years in question, of the rundown of experienced personnel and flyers in the RAF.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): As it is the policy of the hon. Gentleman's party to spend money not on nuclear weapons but on conventional forces, and as I understand that 200 extra Tornado aircraft are one of its options, where will it get the money for the pilots, or even the pilots to fly the aircraft? What sum of money is it setting aside to cover that extra cost?

Mr. McNamara: I cannot answer that question in the precise financial terms in which I would like to answer it, because the Government do not produce line-by-line budgets for the House to examine where expenditure has gone. The hon. Gentleman's question cannot validly be asked of me until Ministers are prepared to give us the detailed breakdown of the defence budget that will enable us to do so. All they will give us are rounded sums by which we can calculate what one could do by savings from Trident on the basis of the figures given by the Department for the training, running, purchase, capital and spares costs over 20 years. If the Minister would give us the complete defence budget so that we could see exactly what is going on, I would be in a position, and would be delighted, to give the hon. Gentleman precise details of every item of expenditure. He knows that he has bowled a no-ball—and if he had sent it down to the Minister, it would have yorked his middle stump, because the Minister could not have given him the information either.

Mr. Carter-Jones: The hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) would love to have intervened at this point because he has always advocated the supply of auxiliary Air Force members, and he has fought his corner well, while the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson) has not taken this point. In 1939, the Air Force was kept going not just by the regulars but by substantial numbers of people who had a little "A" on the side of their arms, meaning that they were auxiliaries and a substantial number who had "VR", who were from the volunteer reserve. My hon. Friend bear in mind that the Government, despite the pl several Conservative Members, have never pursue point.

Mr. McNamara: I am grateful to my hon. Frie takes me back five paragraphs to when I drew att to the national guard in the United States as a which people who go into the civil airlines c maintained in military personnel. One of the inte points about some of the recent NATO exercises hav that the United States army and air force hav squadrons staffed by national guard officers. We take that on board.

Our pilots are now training in a basic trainer a that is often 10 years older than the student pilots. defences are dependent on aircraft that could hav placed in Hendon museum long ago.

Mr. Marlow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way

Mr. McNamara: Yes, I shall give way. However, now given way at least five times and I should perh on with my speech. If the hon. Gentleman wis interrupt me, that will only delay matters and I alw to ensure that hon. Members who wish to speak ha opportunity to do so.

Mr. Marlow: I am extremely grateful, for the r that the hon. Gentleman has given, that he has h courtesy of giving way. The hon. Gentleman is about problems of morale, and he is talking abo problems of losing personnel. The hon. Gentleman hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), was indisposed yesterday. In March last year, Gri Grant and Co., one of London's leading stockb forecast that, up to 1989, the RAF budget is to be sq by 5 to 6 per cent. each year. A consensus has gro among economists and defence experts on both sides political spectrum that further cuts will be made, a expenditure survey published last week or the week shows that for roughly two years, about £1 billi come off the defence budget. That will put a squeeze on what we can achieve.

As the Minister spoke about the number of airc shall ask him for some information about some of and perhaps we can have some answers from the Secretary later. I refer first to the continuing saga Tucano. The Minister has told us that the RA officially just received its first production of the Tucano aircraft after four months of slippage and e modification. We know, however, that it has not g a flying school to start to train our pilots. Instead, gone to the Empire test pilot school at Boscombe Down for evaluation and certification trials. In other words, it has not yet been given the release for service. If Boscombe Down is not happy with it, further changes will have to be made, which will mean more money being spent and further delays.

The Provost jet is over 30 years old and is one of the most expensive aircraft to fly. However, our trainee pilots are having to use this jet, which entered the RAF service in 1956 and in many cases is a decade older than its student pilots. Furthermore, it continually has to be patched up and maintained, which is expensive. We also know that the training manual for the Tucano has not yet been written and cannot be because the Boscombe Down trials have not yet been completed.

We know about the pilots being trained in the Royal Saudi air force. It is receiving its PC9s at the rate of two a month. Most of them are put together in Brough, in the constituency of the hon. Member for Beverley (Sir P. Wall), where a good job is being done. We know that the PC9s do not need changes, modifications or further trials by test pilots. If the Ministry of Defence had opted for the PC9s, it would have had two aircraft in service by the end of 1986 and 12 in service by mid-1987. The Saudis will have 14 in service by mid-year and 28 in service by the end of the year.

How many Tucano aircraft will be in RAF service by the middle of this year and by the end of this year? I do not mean undergoing trials but actually in the service of the RAF, training our pilots. I suspect that the answer will be less than half a dozen, if that, because our aircraft are continuing to experience problems.

It was interesting to hear what the Minister had to say about Hawk and the fact that it had gone to the Swiss. The way in which the Ministry of Defence tried to sabotage the PC9 to claim credit for the Swiss taking the Hawk takes a lot of beating. Credit for that goes to British Aerospace and must be recognised as such. The ability of British Aerospace to work with Swiss companies has enabled it to be successful. It is a sad reflection that the Saudis, with their important budget and their important order with us, took the PC9, the one that the Government were not prepared to take for the RAF.

I welcome also the fact that, eventually and finally, the Hawks have been fitted with side pylons that will enable them to carry their Sidewinder missiles for emergency point defence in the event of war. The fact that this has been demonstrated will show many countries the effectiveness of the Hawk as a defence aircraft. We should welcome that fact.

Over the past years, there has been much controversy in the House about AWACS and Nimrod. I do not wish to reopen that controversy. I am concerned about the situation that still exists. The Shackleton still has a 1941-designed radar—updated, refitted and so on, but basically 1941 technology. Very brave, dedicated men fly Shackletons. They are old aircraft. As one expert recently told me, for all the good that Shackleton radar will be against modern Soviet aircraft such as the long-range fighter, the Fencer, the Backfire nuclear bomber or the latest Blackjack, the crew of the Shackleton might just as well stand in the astrodome with a pair of binoculars.

Our interceptors, including the new Tornado F3, will be of little use against a low-flying Soviet aircraft unless they can be guided to their targets by adequate airborne early warning which the RAF would have had, perhaps much more quickly and much more satisfactorily, had it gone for Nimrod. The decision has been made to go for AWACS. We know that it cannot be replaced until 1991 at the earliest. The system that replaces will not be capable of meeting all the specifications set out in ASR400. Air Chief Marshal Sir David Craig has made it clear that such aircraft will not be enough to meet the patrol specification of four aircraft on station and that even if another two are ordered, there still may not be enough to provide adequate coverage of Britain's north-east flank. This means that perhaps 2,000 jobs have been sacrificed and nearly £1 billion has been wasted, and still we will not have the full adequate early warning capability that we need.

What will happen to the Nimrod frames? The Under-Secretary of State said that some may be used for maritime reconnaissance—we welcome that—and some might be used for electronic intelligence. There are many frames. Presumably, over the years, some could be cannibalised, but it would be a terrible waste of what has proved to be an effective reconnaissance aircraft. Does the RAF have more precise plans than perhaps the hon. Gentleman was prepared to state earlier?

The Tornado F3 is important. It will be the mainstay of our air defences in the 1990s. However, I understand that the aircraft is known to RAF crews as a Blue C ircle fighter because it must fly with a concrete weight in the nose while it awaits the Foxhunter fire control radar. Despite the Minister's reassurances last year and the year before, he has said, "We are still redefining the programme." Have the Government set a time scale—a limit? Can they give us a firm date when this important piece of radar will be installed in the aircraft? Basically, until they have that radar, they will be at least 50 per cent. below their capability, if not more. Although it is right to praise the aircraft, as the Minister did, if they do not have the Foxhunter fire control radar, defence capability will be limited indeed.

The Minister said that the Opposition was jaundiced about the Saudi contract. I was not jaundiced, I was delighted, as the Ministry was, but for different reasons. The Ministry was delighted because it meant that it did not have to pay for them for the RAF, and that it could postpone the payment. I was delighted because it showed the prowess of the design and expertise of the countries and the men involved. If the Ministry had wished to show its belief in the worth of the RAF, it would have opened another line to make sure that the RAF got its aircraft at the same time as the Saudis.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South) rose——

Mr. McNamara: With the greatest respect to the hon. Gentleman, I promise that, if Mr. Deputy Speaker allows me to catch his eye when the debate is wound up and the hon. Gentleman still wants to make his point, I shall give way. [Interruption.] I have not even started.

The Minister said that we shall have the Harrier GR5 at the beginning of next year. I presume that that is the first batch of the 62 aircraft that will come into operation then. What will happen — the hon. Gentleman did not mention this—to the second batch? We recall the debate on the Defence Estimates. The Secretary of State gave signs that, whilst some matters were being ordered for long lead items, there was some concern. Will we go ahead with the second batch of GR5, and when? If we are to do so, what is to become of the present group of GR3s in Germany?

I refer to the European fighter aircraft to be certain that it is safe and will not be cut because of Trident. EFA is essential to our ability to provide adequate air cover for our forces on the central front, and our ability to produce a combat aircraft well into the future depends upon EFA going ahead. By the time EFA is meant to enter RAF services in 1995, Soviet Fulcrum and Flanker aircraft will be well into their mid-life update. At the moment, they are more advanced than any British aircraft of a comparable role. We must be certain not only that we are to get EFA but that there will be no slippage in the time scale for getting it into operation with our Air Force. Therefore, we welcome the fact that the Nato European Fighter Management Agency, NEFMA—not quite as ugly an acronym as UKADGE—has been set up. We welcome the fact that the agency has put out for tender the two most crucial items, the interim engine and the radar. But the pressure must be maintained. We cannot afford slippages with an aircraft as important as this.

Last week, we heard that after only three months, the experimental aircraft programme has been grounded due to lack of funds. EAP is the technology test bed for EFA, or for the British components within EFA. Unless funds are made available by the Ministry of Defence, British chances of winning a share of contracts in EFA could be jeopardised, particularly Rolls-Royce for the RB199 interim engine. Therefore, I urge the Minister to look carefully at financing EAP and to see whether it can be used more continuously.

The tragic loss of the space shuttle Challenger has resulted in our Skynet satellite remaining earthbound. If the HOTOL system goes ahead, Britain will never again be plagued with such a problem. HOTOL is one of the most exciting projects in United Kingdom aviation. It seems to be years ahead of any alternative system and will be much safer. It combines the technology of British Aerospace and Rolls-Royce and, as far as one can find — this information is classified — the revolutionary concepts involved. It is something of which we must be proud and something that we must also keep inside the country. Therefore, we hope that the Government will continue to support it, as they have done until recently.

The space shuttle disaster was due to a leak in the external fuel tank of one of the external booster rockets. Engineers have explained to me that HOTOL would have internal engines and tanks. To a degree, therefore, they would be safer. I understand that that cannot be said of the French and German alternatives. If HOTOL is realised, it will put Europe years ahead of the Americans, whereas Hermes and Saenger will be the poor man's version of the shuttle and will become obsolete. Therefore it is imperative that we should get together with our European colleagues, if the price proves too much for us to sustain by ourselves, to demonstrate the advantages of our system and obtain European collaboration on it. All sides of the House agree about the need to build up a strong European technology pillar for both defence and civil purposes. If this system could be used, we should try to develop it.

Is there more precise information about the Skynet I, II and III satellites? When are they likely to go into orbit? I have seen the film that caused controversy earlier this afternoon. I saw it long before there was any mention of an injunction. As the injunction has been granted, I do not intend to pursue the matter further.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Why then does the hon. Gentleman mention it?

Mr. McNamara: I mention it because some people know that I have seen the film. Therefore, I thought it essential to explain the circumstances in which I had seen it—long before there was any mention of an injunction.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): The hon. Gentleman is showing off.

Mr. McNamara: The hon. Gentleman must realise that I do not show off. He knows how naturally modest I am. He may say that I have a great deal to be modest about, and I agree with him, but perhaps I do not have quite so much to be modest about as he.

Helicopters featured largely in our debate last week. The Opposition specifically asked for an undertaking from the Government about the future of the supply helicopter. Today the Minister said that there will be a decision by March.

Mr. Hamilton: I hope that there will be a decision by then.

Mr. McNamara: I hope so, too. There is probably more chance of a decision by March than there is of a decision by next December. In March we shall be approaching the witching season. There are many marginal seats in the south-west. Nothing concentrates the mind of any Secretary of State more than marginal seats, when some of his hon. Friends might be at risk. Because of the pressure that has been exerted over the future of the helicopter industry and the Government's role in it, the Government will want to make a specific and early decision.

Since the capital reconstruction of Westland, a £95 million loss have been converted into a £26 million profit. However, two thirds of that profit came from the non-helicopter side of the company, whereas two thirds of the company's expenses related to helicopters. That poses problems for the management. During the past 25 years the helicopter industry has been mainly built up and sustained by the Ministry of Defence, and we look to it to find a way to fill the gap between mid-1988 and 1991 so that the company can sustain and maintain its expertise and technology instead of it being dissipated and drained away, as might happen if there were to be three years of uncertainty. I hope that the Minister will be able to announce that the EH101 utility version will go ahead. It would meet some of BAOR's present requirements. However, I hope that it will be forthcoming not on a drip-feed basis but on a basis that will sustain the company and lead to exports.

One of the problems over helicopters is that for the Royal Air Force they are an afterthought. According to the RAF, helicopters provide a support role for the Army. Last year, the Royal Australian air force decided to hand over its support role to the Australian army. Only the British Army and the Greeks now maintain helicopters in a supply support role for the land forces. It would make sense to consider transferring the RAF's supply support role for the land forces to the Army Air Corps. That would lead to a proper balance in the Army Air Corps.

[Mr. McNamara]

Then the fast fighter pilots, the air commodores and those who make the decisions in the RAF would not treat helicopters as a Cinderella service. I am sure that they try not to do so—that they try to be objective—but when it comes to the allocation of resources within the RAF, I am sure that they are somewhat loth to put the same amount of money into helicopters as they put into other services. Therefore, I urge the Minister to consider that point. It would not be a great loss to the RAF if it lost its helicopter service, but it would provide an enormous boost for the Army Air Corps and the Army generally. It would also make much more sense.

Having consigned the RAF's helicopter service to the Army, the RAF might think that I am being a little ungracious. I merely remind the RAF of the compliments that have been paid to it by all hon. Members for the service that it has provided this winter and in previous years. We wish the RAF well. Whether the service is wearing khaki or RAF blue, we know that we shall be well served. Hon. Members in all parts of the House are proud of the RAF. Whatever the outcome of the general election and the strange meanderings of the Minister, who spent more time on the Labour party's defence policy than upon his Government's defence policy, we must have a Royal Air Force.

The country that puts the Alliance at risk is the country that is unable to carry out the basic conventional role of the Alliance. We have already heard that the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to cut the defence budget. Secretaries of State for Defence, whether it be the previous Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), or the present Secretary of State, are afraid to come before the House and deal with our defence strategy in terms of the financial constraints that will be imposed upon them. It does not matter by how much they may have increased the amount of money that is spent upon defence, important though that may be in terms of the Services. Unless we are able to maintain men in the Services and the conventional role of the Services, we are as nothing. The Minister is afraid even to say whether or not the RAF controls the actual use of nuclear weapons. He knows that it does not.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Will the hon. Gentleman please explain to the House how even the finest conventional forces can face up to an enemy that has nuclear weapons when we do not?

Mr. McNamara: The enemy would not use nuclear weapons against us because he knows that that would kill his own forces. Chernobyl showed us that. Not even the Russians can control the elements, or prevent a backflow of nuclear waste over their own territories.

6.9 pm

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): My hon. Friend the Minister and the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) rightly paid tribute to the personnel of the Royal Air Force. It is worth observing that of our three Services the Royal Air Force has the fewest front line fighting men and the largest number of Service men and Service women in support. Out of approximately 93,000 service men and women in the Air Force, by the very nature of things only a handful can be flying crew.

I am privileged to have in my constituency the N radio school of Royal Air Force, Locking. I know th speak on behalf of many of my constituents when I how proud we are to know many of the serving person who enjoy a close relationship with the town. We welc the great honour paid to RAF Locking in the sum when Her Majesty the Queen paid a whole day visi inspect the forces there.

Inevitably, I should like to speak about the tho subject of helicopters. I hope that the Government come to an early conclusion about them so that I can m speeches about something else. For once, I agree with hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North in comments about the operational direction of sup helicopters. I have been convinced for many years have spoken in the House on several occasions of the c view of those who are supported by the Royal Air Fo the soldiers in the field and to some extent other Ser personnel, that in practice it is not operationally effic to have a different service operating such a vital su route.

My hon. Friend the Minister spoke about the wh philosophy of helicopters. The first step that the cen staff should take is to make certain that those forces wh need helicopters for whatever purpose have control them from the very start. The Royal Navy, which has s control, stands out internationally as the finest oper of helicopters at sea. It has in many respects led the w and much of its success is due to its complete operati control over the training of pilots and the acquisitio aircraft right through to their manning in the ships.

There is a lesson to be learned there and i extraordinary that, year after year, we dodge this decis I know exactly why that happens. It is because the sh term, one-year cost of transition will no doubt expensive. In addition, there will be pressure from marshals who do not want to see the numbers of t forces reduced because that would mean fewer offi fewer promotions and other problems of that sort. N that we have the central staff, surely that is the sor barrier that can and must be broken down.

There is a further argument that some pilots who t for fast jets and cannot make the grade are transferre helicopter training in the RAF. I see no difficulty in cr Service transfers with RAF pilots going to the Army Corps. Some pilots already do cross-Service training it should be encouraged. I repeat my personal view b on my own experience and on the experience of liste to other hon. Members and talking to many Service m that this is crucial for our armed forces.

As for the future of helicopters, there are two rea why we are short of helicopters and short on decis about them. First, there is the tactical reason. I am s that my hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, (Mr. Mates) has left the Chamber. The Minister said he saw no immediate prospect of a change in the r between expenditure on armoured vehicles—I ass that he meant armoured personnel carriers as well as ta and on helicopters. That is sad because it means tha are miles behind in our thinking. The tank is increasi becoming a priority target on the battlefield and increasingly vulnerable to attack by sophistic weaponry held by the infantry and the armour of potential enemies. Experience shows that although helicopter cannot withstand much fire, its mobility and flexibility more than counter this. For this reason, a better balance must be achieved.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend says that the helicopter cannot withstand much fire. A tank, if it is hit by a modern missile, will not withstand much fire either. Has my hon. Friend heard the expression that a battalion in time is worth a division too late? With a support helicopter, one can get a battalion there very quickly but with obstacles and bridges down tanks would take forever in today's circumstances to get to where they are needed.

Mr. Wiggin: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend, and I have argued that case in as much detail as time permits. I urge Ministers to harass their Service advisers until they get a better answer. I say this deliberately because it is not a decision that the military seem inclined to take at the moment. For reasons of their own, neither the air marshals nor the generals will take it. The Americans, the Russians and the armed forces of many other countries have made the decision and they are right.

The second reason why the Government's dilatoriness on helicopters is important is, inevitably, industrial. I make no bones about the fact that Westland has its products support factory in my constituency and is the largest employer there. I should like to read a short extract from the statement by the chairman of Westland plc. It is worth mentioning that from near-bankruptcy some 12 months ago, Westland has, as a result of a capital restructuring — the House knows what took place — become a prosperous company making reasonable profits, but it is left with this one question hanging over the helicopter division.

I think that there is unanimity in the House that it is unacceptable for Britain to be without a helicopter manufacturer. Indeed, the Secretary of State has said that he would abhor such a prospect. The chairman of Westland is clearly a responsible and most competent business man. He has led the company through difficult times and is improving its efficiency by the hour. I am sad to say that there is still some way to go, and I shall say the same to the trade union representatives who are to see me on Friday night. An improvement has already been effected but the chairman of the company says:

"Although studies and development programmes often lead to production orders eventually, they do little to sustain current order books. We have always made it clear that although our production lines are currently very busy in the Helicopter Division at Yeovil, we do face an order book gap some two years hence. The dominant position of the Ministry of Defence as a customer makes its long term helicopter policy of critical importance in planning the future shape and size of this division and we eagerly await the outcome of the last MoD studies.

These studies should be concluded this month and the Secretary of State for Defence said in the House of Commons in October 1986 that a decision would be taken in the new year. It may help to put this long time scale into perspective if I say that the Staff Target, which was generated first in 1978 for the replacement of the RAF Wessex and Puma fleet, is in abeyance and the Secretary of State has now, some eight years later, stated that the fleet will approach the end of its cost effective life 'within the next ten years'. Coherent planning against such widely moving target dates is frankly impossible."

Early in the Minister's speech, the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) intervened and rightly reiterated the problems that will face the management at Westland unless a decision is forthcoming very shortly.

It is worth pointing out that the current problem was first revealed in July 1985 or perhaps even earlier. The company put its case to those of us interested in aviation. That was when the campaign started and, when air staff target 404 became a subject of attention in the House, but more than a year and a half later we are still awaiting a decision. We all know that the Secretary of State is sympathetic and is awaiting a solution from his advisers. I say this to Ministers—let us have a proper solution. We do not want half orders or a dribble of orders, but a proper order. What about 35 or 40 Black Hawks? What about showing the world that we can manufacture that helicopter in Somerset?

Once the RAF has that helicopter other countries will be interested, but we need that lead. The great benefit of the Sikorsky tie-up, the ability to sell Black Hawk in large areas of the world, will be negated if we do not manufacture and buy the aircraft ourselves. It is a fine helicopter and there are plenty of uses for it within our armed forces. It would be a good example and good value and, so long as Westland can deliver—I do not ask for any concessions — I believe that the money will be available from other programmes within the Department.

The concept that Westland should go out of helicopter production is totally unacceptable to me and to many of my hon. Friends. I am reluctant to raise the matter again, but we insist that the dates that have been mentioned this afternoon should be adhered to. If there were any question of there being no decision before Easter it would be catastrophic.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): Although Woolwich is traditionally an Army town, Woolwich arsenal, the future of which is dear to my heart, provides a home for three RAF establishments. On that tenuous basis, I should like to add my tribute to those already given to RAF personnel to whom we owe so much for their contribution to the essential defence of Britain.

I was one of those in the 1970s who strongly supported the AEW Nimrod early warning system. It is right to say that hon. Members from both sides of the House would have been much happier if the contract could have gone to a British firm and to British technology, provided that the British solution could have fulfilled the job that was being asked of it. Sadly, on the basis of the evidence we have seen, it would have been too much of a gamble to go on hoping that the problems with the AEW Nimrod system could have been put right in time to enable it to provide what was required. It would have been wrong to undertake any such gamble with something as vital as an early warning system. Therefore, on the basis of the evidence available to us, I have to say that I believe that the Government made the right decision by choosing the Boeing AWACS.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: If that is so, will the hon. Gentleman explain to the House why, when it came to a critical vote on that matter, the alliance was able only to abstain?

Mr. Cartwright: The position was made clear by our spokesman at the time. We were critical of the Government's handling of the operation. We thought that they had reached the correct decision at the end, but their handling of the matter before it came to that final decision left a great deal to be desired. That view was taken by more than just the alliance. As the Minister knows, some of the Government's own supporters took a similar position.

I shall now move onto something a little safer. The Minister did not mention recruitment and retention in the RAF, but I assume that the Minister who is to reply will deal with those matters. It is worth recalling that in February last year the then Minister of State accepted that there were problems with the recruitment of officers and aircrew. The levels of recruitment were lower than had been hoped for and only 87 per cent. of target was expected to be achieved. The Minister accepted that there was increasing competition from civilian employers, especially in areas where there was a national shortage of specialised skills. It is clear that those are the areas in which the RAF can least afford to lose key personel.

The Minister also said that the rate of premature voluntary retirement among aircrew officers was on the increase. He suggested that applications were then running at a rate of 3 per cent. of trained officer strength. However, he did not tell us how many of those seeking premature voluntary retirement were fast jet pilots and navigators. As the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) has reminded us, it costs over £2·8 million to train a fast jet pilot and £1 million to train a navigator. Therefore, in those areas, the RAF cannot stand much wastage.

I noticed that Jane's Defence Weekly on 17 January contained an interesting article by Air Vice Marshal Mason. It dealt with the general problem of personnel retention in the RAF. It was a balanced article and he reached the conclusion that there was not the crisis of retention that was being suggested in some quarters. However, he went on to say:

> "Nevertheless there has been a noticeable increase in PVR applications over the two years which, although now apparently levelling off, cannot be regarded with complacency."

We are aware of the increased competition from civil airlines, which are apparently facing a pilot shortage because of their failure to train pilots over a 10-year period in the 1970s. As we have seen in the press, British Airways has said that it will be advertising for over 100 qualified pilots in the autumn, and other airlines are expected to follow suit.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): I cannot let the hon. Gentleman's last comment pass. Does he agree that it would have been inappropriate and wrong for British Airways to recruit people when there simply were not jobs available for them? It was one of those unfortunate questions of supply and demand and the demand for pilots was not there. It would have been wrong to recruit pilots simply to have them waiting around.

Mr. Cartwright: I did not intend to be critical of the civil airlines. I was merely pointing out the facts. I was not criticising the airlines for not having trained. The hon. Gentleman is right—the demand was not there. As a result, there was a 10-year dead period. However, there obviously comes a time when one has to try to attract trained pilots in order to meet what has become a growing demand. The obvious way of doing that is to obtain some of those already trained at substantial public expense by the RAF.

Retention is not a simple issue, and many facto involved. However, like the hon. Member for Kin upon Hull, North, I have seen suggestions tha condition of married quarters leaves a great deal desired. It would be helpful if the Minister could t whether the figure of 70 per cent. of RAF married qu not coming up to a reasonable standard is a gen accepted figure; whether reports that the cost of bri the married quarters up to a satisfactory standard, some £400 million, is an accurate assessment; and wh there are, as some people suggest, difficulti guaranteeing that sort of investment.

I should like to concentrate the rest of my remar air defence, especially defence against tactical ba missiles. That subject has raised substantial debate United States and Europe but it has not yet really su in Britain. The argument took off as a result celebrated article by Manfred Worner, the Ge Defence Minister, which appeared in the Strategic R in February 1986.

The scenario set out in that article was chillin argues that the latest generation of Soviet short- ballistic missiles has a much greater accuracy tha predecessors, has improved target acquisition an carry the so-called smart submunitions. He went argue that these missiles would give the Soviet Unio capacity to launch a conventional attack against hun of key NATO targets across western Europe. Amo vital facilities that he suggested would be at risk airfields, aircraft, ammunition stockpiles, radar in tions, command and control centres and vital N reinforcement facilities such as ports and bridges.

Hans Ruhle, the head of the German De Ministry's planning staff, has estimated that betwee and 300 key NATO targets destroyed by a Soviet range missile attack would prevent NATO building cohesive forward defence, prevent NATO from mob reserves and prevent NATO from landing reinforcer He suggested that the use of Soviet short-range miss that role would free thousands of Warsaw pact a that are now assigned for use against these vital N targets. Those aircraft would then be availabl deployment against ground forces in combat alo frontier.

Thus, the use of tactical ballistic missiles would gi Soviets an ability to impair or destroy NATO's c front defences without having to cross the n threshold. NATO commanders would then have t the appalling choice of using nuclear weapons or acc defeat.

As a result of that scenario, the German understandably active in promoting the case for wha call extended air defence. They want defensive sy capable of destroying short-range missiles as w aircraft deployed at the earliest possible opportunity of work is proceeding in that direction; the upgrad the Patriot system to enable it to engage missiles a as aircraft has been proceeding for some time.

There are also a number of more advanced proj the United States with exotic titles—the flexible guided experiment and the homing overlay experime both directed to providing short-range missile defe Isreal the Rafael vertical launch missile is in existen undergoing trial. In France the Aster system is studied.

More fundamental research on defence is taking place in Europe against short-range and tactical ballistic missiles. The European defence initiative is aimed at producing a European ATBM system capable of defending hardened military targets. A number of studies under that umbrella are being carried out under the aegis of the NATO Air Defence Committee. The argument for the Europan defence initiative offers the chance to develop the European pillar of NATO to provide opportunities for the European defence industrial base and to encourage European technology in the field.

There is also growing interest in the United States in the idea of extending the strategic defence initiative to provide missile defence in Europe. Congress has allocated $50 million to the co-operative development of an ATBM system. The Ministry of Defence has been awarded a contract to conduct an architecture study in that area. The Supreme Allied Commander Europe, General Rogers, has regularly given his support to the concept of a defensive system against a Soviet short-range missile threat. After Reykjavik, we have serious propositions on the table to remove all intermediate-range nuclear missiles from Europe, and possibly to phase out strategic ballistic missiles over ten years. It is therefore inevitable that more attention will centre on the question of short-range ballistic missiles.

Four issues arise from the ATBM debate which are worth consideration. First, how seriously do we take the Soviet threat? Can short-range missiles be given the sort of accuracy that will threaten specific individual targets? Some experts argue that they cannot, that the main danger to Europe will continue to come from Warsaw pact aircraft, and that it would be unwise to switch resources away from traditional air defence to missile defence.

What sort of anti-tactical ballistic missile system do we look for? Destroying any missile in flight is a complex and expensive business. Also, we know that tactical ballistic missiles have shorter flight times—between six and 12 minutes, as compared with 30 minutes for a strategic system. Mobile missiles have more complex and less easily identifiable trajectories than the longer-range strategic systems. We are therefore in a difficult and extremely expensive area.

Before we rush down the road of exotic technologies, it is sensible to examine the role of passive measures. Target hardening, dispersal, improved runway repair facilities and other unexciting but effective systems might offer a more cost-effective method of defending against the short-range missile threat.

How would the Soviets respond if Europe was to deploy an ATBM system? They might simply increase the number of missiles and warheads they throw against the defensive system to overwhelm it. They might depress the trajectories of the missiles to make tracking and destruction more difficult. They might add electronic countermeasures to protect the missiles. There will certainly be some Soviet response. We must never lose sight of the fact that it will always be cheaper and easier for the attacker to improve the effectiveness of a ballistic missile attack than it will be for the defender to cope with that improved onslaught.

Lastly, and perhaps most worrying, there is the question of a link which a European anti-ballistic missile system would have to the American SDI and its impact on the ABM treaty. There is considerable United States interest in the whole area of European ballistic missile defence. Some people suggest that that is because it would be used as a stalking horse for SDI. The exotic technologies could be tried out in Europe to see whether they worked and they could then be deployed in the United States after the ABM treaty has collapsed.

This view is reinforced by the fact that Europe is not constrained by the ABM treaty, which applies only to the two super-powers. The ABM treaty deals only with defences against strategic missiles, and therefore does not appear to rule out defence against shorter-range systems. However, systems designed to defend against shorter-range tactical missiles could be used against longer-range systems. The trajectory of a submarine-launched ballistic missile is similar to that of a short or intermediate-range missile. Therefore, a system deployed and designed to tackle short-range systems may have an inherent capability to deal with strategic systems as well. There are also clauses in the ABM treaty that ban the export of United States ABM technology.

These issues are important, because the Government have committed themselves to the ABM treaty. They have also rightly supported the original, narrow interpretation of that treaty, which severely limits what is permissible beyond the stage of pure research.

Ministers in this Government have said little or nothing about the Government's attitude to the threat of tactical ballistic missiles, and we are entitled to ask whether the Government share the growing enthusiasm for the whole ATBM system that is now apparent in the United States and West Germany. It is important that the Government make their position clear, because there is a risk that an understandable anxiety to obtain as many SDI contracts as possible may result in Britain being sucked into the world of exotic technology, which is of doubtful military utility and will involve massive expenditure.

The alliance takes the view that, where resources are scarce, priority must go to essential and long overdue improvements in our bread and butter defences, not chasing a costly dream of a European star wars system.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), who speaks for the alliance on these matters. It is a pleasure also to welcome him back to an official responsibility. These debates are always interesting and the hon. Gentleman dignifies them by his participation, but, I must tell him that the Liberals in Lancashire do not look upon his attitude to defence in the same way as I do. However, despite their incipient hostility to the hon. Gentleman's views on defence, he is welcome to come to Lancashire and talk about defence matters.

I usually like to speak about procurement and equipment matters, because of my constituency interest, but I want to touch briefly on what the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), and, indeed, the hon. Member for Woolwich said about problems with premature voluntary retirement. I read the same article in Jane's Defence Weekly and was particularly concerned to see that PRV has risen substantially in the past two years. That is not something to be extremely exercised about, but it causes some concern. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North suggested that turbulence, the problems of the increasing desire of service wives to have their own careers and a widespread dissatisfaction with service accommodation were matters to which the Minister should address himself when he replies. If he does not do so then, perhaps he will talk to us about it subsequently.

I want to deal with two particular success stories in my constituency. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) is not present. He is an old sparring partner of mine in debates on the RAF. I wanted to tell him of a particular success story in my constituency. In British Aerospace, Samlesbury, over the past few years 100 apprentices, in batches of between eight and 10, have completely restored a mark 19 photo-reconnaissance Spitfire which used to be the gate guardian at RAF Brawdy and is to be delivered to the RAF Memorial Flight. This is an astonishing achievement, because they maintain that it is now better than it ever was. It flew between 1945 and 1957. I believe that it is to be handed over either today or tomorrow. It is a great tribute to those apprentices that that aeroplane looks so fine and will continue to fly for many years because of their work.

It is the same apprentices, perhaps a little older, together with the more adult work force at British Aerospace, who have devoted so much of their time and energy to the experimental aircraft programme—EAP. This is the first British fighter for many years, and many hon. Members will have seen or heard of it flying at Farnborough this year. It is of brilliant design, with excellent production, support, and, above all, display, which again emphasises the excellence of the work force.

I join the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull North in his question about funding for the EAP. It is now grounded and there is some talk that it will not fly at Paris against the equivalent French aeroplane, or rather the less than equivalent French aeroplane. I want to add to the weight of the hon. Gentleman's questions about funding because of its importance to the European fighter in the future.

In the Federal Republic of Germany there is some concern. Negotiations are going on between Ministers here and other partners. I understand that the equipment and avionics companies in Germany are keen for the EAP to be used within Eurofighter, but that the airframe and engine manufacturers are not. Therefore, will my hon. Friend consider the matter and come back to us as soon as he can with some information about the Ministry of Defence's commitment to the EAP.

I am a little concerned about meeting the August deadline on the Eurofighter. As I understand it, there is to be a formal launch in about August, with a development and production programme following therefrom. The German elections—I believe that they are this Sunday—have caused some delays and may cause further delays if there should be a change of Ministers. That is entirely a matter for the winners of the German elections, but, none the less, it is important that, if there were to be a delay, Ministers in Britain should do all that they can to ensure that the learning curve is speeded up so that we do not have further delays.

I support the bidding rules that have been talked about by the Eurofighter consortium in relation to the United States. I know that the United States is getting a little upset because of its belief that it is being excluded from some of the equipment programmes because of our concern within the consortium as a result of the experience on Panavia, and presumably other programmes, over restrictions by the United States Government on potential sales particularly to Warsaw pact countries, and, to extent, but important here, to non-aligned cou know that American companies have expresse concern and we should tell them that they have d same to us in the past. We must not be prepared way without firm guarantees.

By the same token, I support the dem Eurofighter to ensure that if American companies participate they do so through equipment co within the four participating nations. That is impo emphasise and to support, and I hope that Minis take it on board.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, Nor (Mr. Stern) and others may want to speak about relating to the Eurofighter engine. Rather than d House, I invite my hon. Friend to develop that po catches your eye. Suffice it to say that if it is Eurofighter it should have a European rather American engine. That is worth emphasising. I concerned about the radar, because there are d that. I emphasise strongly that for it to be a E fighter we should have European involvement.

I make yet another plea. Please, can we find a n this aeroplane? The French have found a name experimental aeroplane. It is, for those who are no in French, Rafale, which means a gust of wind. us here could draw scatological conclusions fr suggestion. We need a name for the aerople to giv style and romance. My hon. Friend the Mem Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) suggests T but perhaps this is not the time to go into that. to give the aircraft a name, to get it off the ground sense of the word, and for the sake of people in of the world who are likely to be building the ae the RAF and those interested in it. It needs a nam syle, and some romance, and as soon as possible

I have one or two questions on Tornado. Fir those hon. Members who have already spoken to I am extremely worried about the delays on Fo radar, and I know that many in the RAF are also on this score. The House should continue to press Friends, with the greatest possible deference, perh none the less, to press them hard, to get this so It is no earthly good having Nimrods, A Shackletons, or whatever, if the Foxhunter radar does not work properly. We must have that so quickly.

I want to ask about the attrition orders. So far, had only small attrition orders for Tornado. We be content with eight, nine, 10 or whatever it is. help if those orders were forthcoming. By the sam I want an unequivocal assurance that these aircr out of the Saudi Arabian deal will, quite rig replaced at the end of the contract, so that we do conveniently lose them and forget them. The RAF need them and we shall still need them within th

I am delighted, as many hon. Members will k success of Hawk. As a result of the rather sad closure of British Aerospace, Weybridge, much work will be transferred to the Warton division. T I am taking an increasing interest in Hawk. I am that the Swiss preference should yet again have the French in that context. Anyone who knew about the aeroplane would know that it ought has done so. I hope that we shall follow that Ministers will know that the contract has not yet been signed, and we want to ensure that the French will not come back in and try to undercut in the way that they always do. Let us not miss this one.

By the same token, we need to ask some questions about what is being done by the procurement executive over the potential order for Hawks for the United States air force. There is a big order there which is being worked upon and we need to pursue that.

Let me deal now with a perennial problem which exercises many hon. Members—what is known as NIS, NATO identification friend or foe system, or IFF, as it used to be called. I want to know where we are on this. It is a scandal that it has taken so long to resolve the issue. It needs resolving. I know that there has been much discussion about this and all the various radar bands, and so on. I want to know whether we are on stream and when there will be a final solution to the difficulties.

The hon. Member for Woolwich talked about radar generally and airborne early warning. I have been particularly fascinated by some work in the United States, particularly by the United States air force, on what it calls OTH radar—over-the-horizon radar. This is fascinating work. Can my hon. Friend give me any information about that, if not now, in writing later? What work are we doing? Have we developed any areas, and are we working with the United States air force?

The other matter of great interest is SEAD—these dreadful acronyms, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement is so right—supression of enemy air defence. There is some interest in this because of the potential contract that could arise for Tornadoes. Hon. Members will be aware that the F4Es and F4Gs are being used together with the F16Cs and F16Ds, but that, with the German demand for development of the ECR Tornado, using either the HARM missile or ALARM missile, this potential contract for more Tornadoes has to be worked on. I hope that Ministers are putting their minds to this, and perhaps they will be able to give me some information about the project.

While on the question of the ALARM missile, I do not want to say any more than to ask: what has happened to it? It is becoming a matter of concern, especially in the context of British Aerospace perhaps being involved in negotiations with Royal Ordnance and the product liability problems that might arise.

We have heard that the Phantoms are to be re-winged at Brough. How many are to be re-winged? Is it the lot? If so, will this affect the F4Gs that we purchased recently?

I share hon. Members' concern about the Tucano. Although I am entirely happy that Short, being the magnificient company that it is, will meet the contract deadlines, I should like to know how it will do so. What is the delay on wing redesign? Is there a delay on the engine? When will delivery come back on stream?

I turn now to the general context of procurement. I am concerned about the Foxhunter radar. We have all been concerned about the Nimrods. Questions need to be asked on a continuing basis. I hope that the Select Committee on Defence will turn its attention in general terms to procurement, if only to update the excellent report that was produced under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) when he was in charge of that activity. That investigation exercised the minds of many hon. Members and was, if I may say so in the context of a RAF debate, a much cooler and calmer inquiry into procurement than when other matters, such as Westland and AWACS, featured in the broad political arena rather than in the specific RAF arena. We need to look at some of these areas, and the Foxhunter and Alarm give an ideal hook on which to hang questions.

I am delighted that at long last my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, together with, I presume, the Minister of State for the Armed Forces, and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces, has devoted some attention to small firms in competitive procurement. His initiative on the small firms advice division and the research initiative is to be warmly welcomed, particularly the possibility of representation at Ministry of Defence research establishments, which has been offered to many small firms. I know that the Defence Manufacturers Association, so ably represented by Brigadier Dick Purvis in all its activities, would welcome this move. I am sure that the association would want more to happen. I extend congratulations on where we have got so far, but say, please keep it up.

Procurement is the subject of the future. What is going on with advanced STOVL, short take-off and vertical landing? We had a lead in short take-off with the Harrier, and so on. I recognise that we needed to go to America because of the major deals that were offered by the United States marines. I do not take kindly to anyone in the industry suggesting that we should retain this initiative entirely. We needed to go abroad, but having done so we should not lose the initiative in terms of advanced short take-off and vertical landing.

There is much to be done. A lot of work in being done in the United Kingdom on the type of engine that should be used in the future. Hon. Members who are specialists in these matters may wish to talk about the many variants. I am concerned that Rolls-Royce is quoted as saying that it is receiving official interest from the Ministry of Defence and is wondering what is to happen. Is this true? If it is true, why are we not showing official interest? I do not pose that question in any pejorative sense, but I should like to know what has happened and what is happening. There is a probability of a five-year delay before advanced STOVL can be expected to be active. We need some measure of commitment, even if it is only a nod and a wink.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Last summer I was in California and visited the Aimes research laboratory, a NASA establishment. Is my hon. Friend aware that scientists at Aimes are undertaking work into advanced STOVL and are very concerned at the lukewarm attitude of the United Kingdom? They told me that it would be most unfortunate if the United States were to go ahead with this alone without the United Kingdom. Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a severe risk that unless we show a commitment from the United Kingdom Government the initiative could be wholly seized by the United States?

Mr. Atkins: My hon. Friend, who is a specialist in these matters, reinforces the plea that I make to Ministers that we make a commitment. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will be able to say something about this.

I dare to raise the chemical weapons problem in the absence of the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), who always cocks an eye when I talk about chemical weapons. This matter concerns me and is relevant to this debate, just as it is to a debate on the Army, Navy or defence generally. We know that the Warsaw pact has chemical shells. I guess that there is a possibility that it also has chemical missiles or chemical warheads within missiles. If it can use them with shells, it can use them from aircraft. I pose this question again, not believing necessarily that we need a defensive capability, but believing that we do need some understanding and some capability to recognise that this is a very real threat.

There are some who argue within the military mile—my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State may well hear them more often than I do—that there will not be a nuclear war because the Soviet Union needs only to flip across a few shells or missiles, which will cause dificulties in terms of nuclear, biological and chemical warfare, the equipment that our soldiers, sailors and airmen would have to wear, and all the rest of that argument. I pose that question again, because it needs posing and it needs some sort of answer.

I am concerned that the United States Navy, admittedly with its economies of scale, is looking very hard at another British initiative, the airship. Does the Ministry of Defence have an interest in the airship? Does it have any connection with it now? Does the Ministry have a role for it, or will it go abroad and be lost because we cannot produce a requirement for it?

The Ministry of Defence has a large usage of helicopters which have an impact on civilian activities. With the closure of the Trigg Lane site, the usage and conjestion of the Battersea heliport, which is used greatly by the Ministry of Defence, is causing concern. I know that the Ministry of Defence and the Minister of Transport are keen to do something about that. Is my hon. Friend the Minister able to say anything about any delays that there may be in the Department of the Environment or anywhere else, and what pressure he is exerting to resolve the problem?

I have been asked by the Society of British Aerospace Companies to ask what is happening at Farnborough. Have the problems over the enclave been resolved? Has the society been able to see plans on the division in Farnborough? What is the future of this great air show, the window that we provide as the best possible demonstration of the virtues of the British aerospace industry, of those who participate in and produce goods for it and of those who sell for it? It is crucial that Farnborough develops and that any difficulties between the MOD and the SBAC on the future of Farnborough are resolved to everyone's satisfaction.

I have spoken for too long as usual, but my plea is that I only ever speak in this debate and therefore try to concentrate on it. There is an enormous amount of good news in the aerospace and aviation industries, and the RAF is often the beneficiary of it. A remarkable amount has been done with defence sales, as I said in an intervention, with the exports that the aerospace industry has provided and the quality of work done by RAF pilots and aircrew the length and breadth of the world in a variety of environments. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister and ask him to pass those congratulations on to the RAF for the work that it does, coupled with the enormous regard and respect that we have for the aerospace industry, its engines, airframes and equipment. We have done pretty well so far. Keep it up.

I shall ask not so many questions as the ho for South Ribble, but I wish to consider thr areas. The first concerns the vexing, continui relates to the first, is the growing divergenc between the American element of the Allian

as democratic Socialists and those who see th
Liberals or Conservatives. Unless both sets that those differences are resolved.

Transatlantic frictions have been with us sin origins. It is often forgotten that the impetus fo
NATO came from Socialist parties in Europe,

Socialist parties in NATO countries have helpe the Alliance. It is therefore imperative that the which have emerged in recent years should

Left. Many people in the United States and i wing and centre parties in NATO are expr reservations about NATO's directions.

I shall mention only a few of the differences. There are differences over econo arms control, nuclear weapons and nucle chemical weapons and neutron bombs, ab policy, for instance, on central America about to terrorism—for instance, the American Libya—and about out-of-area activity, bur and decision making. One could spend enumerating the many other differences b Alliance. One author recently epitomised thes when he said:

"In recent years, an air of crisis has hung hea
Atlantic. Americans have accused Europeans o anti-American thoughts and of risking self-Fi Europeans have countered with charges that turned into an irrational ally with a fascination power whose follies could drive Europe into an and devastating war."

The differences are expressed by many sources and many political parties. If they are not addressed and contained, the Alliance will face fragmentation.

I belong to that group of people—as, I hope, do the majority in the Labour party—who believe that the future security of this nation, Europe and America is bound up in a continuation and strengthening of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation. It has served this country and many democratic nations well and I hope that it will continue to do so for many years.

In recent years, Socialist parties have emerged which were in the van of setting up NATO and which helped to sustain it. Nevertheless, perceptions have diverged. New policies have not burst forth or come from a vacuum. Indeed, for a number of years, Socialist parties have been questioning NATO strategy in many different forums that have emerged. Their policies can almost be seen as alternative or Social Democratic security policies. These emerging parties include Socialist International, Scandilux and Eurosud. It is important to point out that, although all these parties — that of the Danes, the SPD in Germany and the British Labour party—are critical of NATO, they begin their policy documents by reiterating their parties' support for the continuation of a north Atlantic Alliance.

The people who advocate those policies—I view them from an objective, even dispassionate, perspective—are only one side in the argument. One can look at the other and see those who believe that NATO's current security policies exacerbates the threat to the Alliance. They propose policies which some people view with considerable anxiety. American initiatives such as SDI, opposition to nuclear-free and chemical-free zones and concepts such as deep strike are encountering criticism. Unless there is some compromise in NATO and other forums, the future of the Alliance is a worrying issue.

An acid test of the efficacy of the alternative policies might be the West German elections in the near future. The SPD, which is similar to the Labour party, is pursuing policies similar to those of the Labour party, although it appears to be less unilateralist than the Labour party. The German electorate's verdict on a range of SPD policies, including security, will be interesting. It might give some pointers to the British Labour party on the future direction of electoral opinion in this country.

My third point has had some publicity this week. Rumours have been circulating for some time that Britain is reviewing its commitment to NATO in Denmark and Schleswig-Holstein in the form of the United Kingdom mobile force. Some people might say that Denmark is a faraway country in which we have little interest. Some might ask, "Why should we worry about stationing troops in Denmark?" One must obviously add that, in terms of the military balance, Denmark occupies a strategic position of critical importance to NATO's future. We spend a great deal of time looking at the central region and perhaps less time than we should looking at the northern and southern flanks. In view of Soviet military strategy, the flanks are in many ways indistinguishable. British forces in the central region could be outflanked via Denmark and the Baltic, so the northern and central regions must be seen as inextricably entangled.

Denmark may be a minor military power but it is of overwhelming geo-strategic importance. British forces committed to that country in time of tension or war are vital to our security. What are our commitments to Denmark? Paragraph 432 of the statement on the 1986 Defence Estimate states:

"The United Kingdom Mobile Force (1 Infantry Brigade and logistic support) is earmarked for deployment in tension or war to the Allied Forces Baltic Approaches, where it would reinforce either Denmark or Schleswig-Holstein. The RAF's recently strengthened Air Transport Force could be available to assist with the deployment of reinforcement forces."

Obviously, in any crisis the Royal Air Force would have a major role operating above and around the Baltic approaches. Therefore, as a previous Secretary of State for Defence said when he admonished the Danes a couple of years ago, some 20,000 young British men may be putting their lives at risk for the security of Denmark. Therefore, we have a great interest in what that country does, just as it has in what we do.

If there is any truth in the strong rumours circulating that the Government, to match commitments and resources, seek to curtail, withdraw and cut the United Kingdom mobile force, hon. Members on both sides of the House should resist that strongly because it is not subordinate or superflous to our interests. What happens to our security in the Baltic approaches is as important to our defence as what happens on mainland Britain. I have put a number of formal parliamentary questions to the Minister for written answer. I should like a reassurance, following the words of the Under-Secretary of State last week, that there are no plans to revise that policy. I hope that that statement will prove to be correct.

Many people, not least in Denmark, are obviously worried about this and it is important that that reassurance is given. If it is not given, the Government must be prepared to accept a great deal of criticism, and rightly so. This is not a debate on the Danish White Paper, but if one looks at the vulnerability of NATO in that area and the volume of Soviet and Warsaw pact forces that may be directed against Denmark, the timely arrival of 20,000 British forces would be absolutely essential. Denmark is a small country. Despite its home guard and small forces it could not sustain a defence effort for any time without the timely arrival — indeed, the arrival before a conflict starts — of the British and the Americans. Unless we arrived in time, that country would be lost and Britain's strategic vulnerability would be adversely affected.

We should consider what the Soviet armed forces have. The Baltic fleet consists of 24 amphibious warfare vessels and 100 amphibious assault craft. It also has 135 tactical strike aircraft such as Backfire, Badger, Blinder, Fitter and Forger. These could be joined by a possible 200 aircraft from the Soviet air force. Many other forces are available to Warsaw pact countries. Indeed, from reading literature emanating from the Soviet Union it is obvious that it appreciates the importance of Denmark for British forces and for NATO. The Soviet Union fully realises that, if it could acquire Denmark in time of conflict, it would win game, set and match.

What is Denmark's alternative defence view? Seeking some aid and comfort, I have read the bible — the alternative defence prospective, or defence without the bomb. That is the report of the alternative defence commission. On page 124 it states:

"The Soviet Union could either adopt two approaches to a full-scale attack on western Europe. The first is one which does not figure largely in present NATO planning but which appears in principle plausible. The Soviet forces would attack the relatively vulnerable Norway and Denmark first, go on to Britain and only then concentrate on central Europe. In that case Britain could mount a military resistance in the hope of eventual victory and, even if overrun by Soviet forces, could still harry them by partisan tactics and sabotage."

Although many people may question the concept of deterrence, I should like to see an alternative concept to deterrence put rather more formidably that it has been in recent years before I am prepared to abandon the concept of deterrence as the only means of protecting this country and the rest of the Alliance.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meironnydd Nant Conwy): The hon. Gentleman referred to a report of which I was one of the signatories. Will he explain the political context in which he envisages the Soviet Union invading Denmark?

Mr. George: The hon. Gentleman may look at a whole variety of scenarios. I am not saying that a conventional conflict is imminent, because if NATO is strong there will be no conflict. When one considers the vulnerability of NATO, the growing sophistication and numbers of Soviet and Warsaw pact forces, and some allies who are decidedly vulnerable on their own, if the hon. Gentleman thinks that a defence policy can be devised simply on the basis of hoping that the Soviet Union will never have any aspirations to expand, he is naive beyond words. I do not belong to the gang or group who would argue that somehow we must challenge the Soviet Union, but I should want our defences to be viable and reasonable, so that if there were a likelihood of conflict, any adversary would be neutralised.

Mr. Thomas: That is no answer.

Mr. George: There are several scenarios. If the hon. Gentleman cares to discuss this in more detail, I shall be only too willing to do so.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Will my hon. Friend cast his mind back to the point that he made about a possible Soviet strike across the Norwegian border? If we needed to resist that possibility, would it not be better for the Norwegians to take the electricity that lights that frontier from their own sources rather than from the Soviet Union, or is the Soviet Union such a great threat in those circumstances?

Mr. George: I do not think that denying the Soviets electricity will slow them down especially. If we are to devise a defence strategy, some aspects of the alternative defence approach should be considered carefully. Increasing the lines on reserve is important, but several of the strategies that one reads about—not just in Britain but elsewhere—must be ancillary to a conventional strategy of deterrence and not a substitute for them.

From the literature, one gains the impression that guerrilla warfare and fighting in the streets is seen as a substitute. There is certainly a history of resistance to aggressors in the part of the country from which the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) comes, but in other parts of Britain there is certainly no Yugoslav partisan tradition. As someone once said, "All that would slow down the Soviets if they reached England would be the contraflow system on the motorway."

Defence policy must be proper, balanced and conventional. The majority of Labour Members would argue that we do not need to shelter behind the American nuclear umbrella. Nevertheless, until it is proved to me that Britain would be safe without NATO, I shall rest on the past attitude of the Labour party since 1

the RAF wanted a system which worked. The system will provide the eyes for our air defence. However, I cannot say that I am 100 per cent. satisfied with it, because I am not. None of the systems would do the job as we hoped, but of the systems available now, we have undoubtedly chosen the best.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) touched on the problem of the NATO identification of friend or foe system. It is important that that is dealt with soon. It is interesting to talk about the difficulties that are being faced in all our high technology areas as we seek to reach parameters of the achievable in an attempt to operate equipment and systems — for example the difficulties with the Foxhunter radar. The Tornado is a fine aircraft, but if we cannot get the radar to function, it will not be the fine aircraft that the crew require.

Hon. Members with any knowledge of aircraft know that most of the unserviceability that occurs in operational fighting conditions is not with the aeroplane or the engine, but with the gubbins — the stuff that is put in. Inevitably, we have found the radar, radio and electronics to be faulty at some time. One can live with some faults, but not with others.

I am worried that we hear so much today, especially from the Labour Front Bench, about how conventional forces will provide a deterrent to the Soviets. I remind them that there is not a single area of modern high technology where we have not had some difficulties. We seem to be growing ever more dependent on complicated radar and communications equipment and the more we depend on them, the more vulnerable we shall be if the equipment is in any way suspect. As yet, there is no known viable alternative to the nuclear deterrent capability. I have yet to meet an air marshal who is opposed to Britain having a nuclear deterrent capability and who says, "We should not have Trident." The RAF recognises that Trident is an essential part of our deterrent capability.

We must look carefully at the next generation of aircraft. I was delighted to see an experimental aircraft flying at Farnborough. I am sorry that there appear to be short-term difficulties and that the aircraft is not being used as extensively as we would wish. I remind my hon. Friends on the Front Bench that it is not only the Harrier GR5 which must survive over the battlefield day and night, but, more important, the European fighter aircraft, which is to be the air superiority aircraft—the first since the Hunter—which must fly and survive in battlefield conditions. It is important that we get the right aircraft and equipment on time. I also remind my hon. Friends that the F16, the world's most formidable air superiority aircraft, began life as a demonstrator. Therefore, I hope that that is sufficient incentive to get our demonstrator aircraft back into the air.

At the beginning of the debate, mention was made of the role of helicopters in rescue squadrons. I add my congratulations to those rescue squadrons to whom we also owe a great debt. They regularly fly in the hills in my constituency to remove unfortunate people who have got into difficulties on the mountains, especially in ski areas. They do a splendid job and we must never take it for granted.

Although it is important to have a viable, working relationship on the battlefield with helicopters it is not easy to marry the needs of Army helicopter pilots with the needs of RAF helicopter pilots. RAF helicopter pilots must do more than fly into a battlefield. That is why their training is longer and more expensive. Therefore, in considering the use of helicopters, we must not forget that the most important ingredient in the helicopter is the chap who flies it. We must make certain that we do not undervalue him and I am sure that the RAF will not do so. If there were a merger, someone might think that an RAF pilot would get by with the Army's less expensive training programme, but I would caution against that.

I agree with what was said earlier about the problem of replacement helicopters. I should like to see a decision soon on the future of replacement battlefield helicopters. I should also like soon to see the auxiliary helicopter squadrons that I was promised some time ago. I am still waiting for them and hope that they are not far away.

Most hon. Members who live in rural constituencies will from time to time receive complaints about low-flying aircraft. I should like to place on record my views which I regularly give to constituents who complain. Indeed, my wife is convinced that the RAF uses our house as a turning point. It is essential that we continue to train our pilots to the high standards necessary to survive in modern conditions. We cannot do that without training them continually in low flying. If they are to avoid detection and being shot down, they must be able to fly fast and low.

I remind the House that people selected for this kind of task must have ability and what is called an aptitude to fly, but the most important single ingredient is motivation—a love to fly. There is no way in which one can have a fast-jet pilot constantly on duty who does not love flying because, quite frankly, he would be totally unsuitable and, for a variety of reasons, a danger to himself and everyone else. We must try, as early as we can, to instil in young people a love of flying. I shall give my further suggestions on how to do that later on.

I am pleased that the auxiliary missile squadrons, which do a splendid job, have expanded recruitment and that that is going well. Those of us who remember the days of RAF Transport Command are pleased to note that, at long last, we have developed this capability and ability to deploy overseas. I congratulate all those who were involved in the recent exercise in the Arabian gulf. Having served in that region as a young man, I know that it is not a part of the world that I would recommand for a vaacation. However, it is an important area for the defence of the United Kingdom's oil interests and we have to make sure that we can get a force out there to do a job in a short time. The deployment exercise made those who are interested in this aspect of operations very happy. We were delighted at the use of the TriStar tankers and how well they operated.

I have been interested in some of the observations by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) with regard to a non-nuclear capability. I have one question. How do the Nimrod aircraft, acting in their anti-submarine role, sink a deep-running Soviet submarine, once located, in the absence of nuclear depth charges? I want to know how those submarines will be sunk if we are relying on a non-nuclear capability. If the Opposition can answer they will be on the way to convincing me that somehow they can look after our maritime interests effectively. As yet, I have not had an answer from the Opposition—I do not believe that they know the answer.

I was pleased to hear my hon. Friend the Minister advise the House of the use of reserve officers on the

[Mr. Walker]

VC10s and the use of reserve QFIs at the university air squadrons. Those units should be encouraged and I have pleaded for that for years.

Perhaps Ministers will be able to give some details of aircrew and pilot training and how the Tucano, which was rolled out last week, has progressed. Are the Government satisfied that they can maintain the Jet Provost fleet at an operational level and an acceptable cost? If there are any exceptional costs, will these be charged to Shorts? The requirement, as I remember, is that they should deliver on time.

How is the programme going for the Chipmunk refurbishing? If we are to consider a replacement aircraft for the Chipmunk, it must be an aircraft that can excite, and be enjoyed by, not only the cadets who must fly it but also the volunteer pilots. The Chipmunk is unique. It has a tail down. It was designed in 1948 and it is reminiscent of the aeroplanes that I knew in my younger days. The people who fly the Chipmunk love it. If another aeroplane is put in its place, please let it have the attractions of the Chipmunk.

An important area to consider, and one of importance to me, is that of air cadet studies. I am very pleased at the interest that the Front Bench has shown in this and I would also like to include in my thanks previous Ministers at the Ministry of Defence for their interest. May I also take this opportunity to place on record the thanks of the Air Cadet Organisation to Air Marshal Sir John Sutton, C-in-C of Support Command and the support of Air Vice Marshal Don Spottiswood of Support Command. They have taken a keen day-to-day interest in the affairs of the cadets. It is marvellous that senior officers are interested in the young men who are the future Royal Air Force. Thanks should also be given the staff at the headquarters of Air Cadets RAF Newtown and thanks for the continuing interest of the staff of the Central Gliding School at RAF Syerstom and also the volunteer officers of the air experience flights, the volunteer officers of the volunteer gliding schools and the volunteer officers of the squadrons.

In the debate on 1 July last year I raised some specific questions. Although I do not expect the Minister to answer those questions this evening—I understand, in the time available, that would be unlikely — but I should be grateful if the Department could give me some information soon.

I wonder if the Minister has been advised of the situation at 661 Volunteer Gliding School which is based at Kirknewton? The United States air force plans to take over that base. We welcome the United States forces and it is my experience that when a volunteer gliding school has operated from a United States air base, the United States has always been a good host. At that base there is a need for Falklands-type hangars to house the gliders. At present, portakabins are having to be used and it is difficult to maintain morale when gliders have to be kept in trailers. There is also no accommodation for the staff; they are doing their best in what might be called a "current category" situation but it is extremely difficult.

I also wish to know what is happening with 641 Volunteer Gliding School—I raised this matter in our last debate in the House—concerning the possible use of a former RAF base at Anston, which is now an Army base. The aircraft flying from that base could use the radio to satisfy Newcastle airport for air control p sailplanes are well equipped and can be c any other aircraft. That would be activating that unit. There is some security of tenure at the Volunteer Glidi Ma'ling. Perhaps the Minister will enc authority to give the Air Force a lease l months.

What is the situation with regard replacements and winches? There is n present winches are not good enou modern sailplanes which are too heavy f is a particular problem when there is a has happened about my previous plea fo launching gliders? Unlike conventional launching glider can operate off the run Grobb 109, which is a less expensive air the job.

What has happened about the advanc which a decision was reached some tim should happen about the second gliding which was also agreed? We should experienced pilots who have previou different aircraft such as the Hercules, th transport and communication aircraft. I proposition that those who fly the C senior ex-RAF officers — should be c two or three-week courses so as to knowledge of those aircraft for which th a licence.

I said that I would return to the officers who man the air experience fli gliding schools and the squadrons. I that these gentlemen get no pay. The o are paid is when they attend full-time all their time voluntarily and unpaid. M or 30 years' service. Indeed, some are n service. They attend units, often for eve year. How many hon. Members know almost every weekend of their life to sor golf?

I ask the House to give this matter because 20 or 40 years of attending gliding schools and air experience fli three evenings a week for the squadron work. Is it not time that we reviewed th award honours to this unique group o

My hon. Friend the Under-Secreta Armed Forces will find that less than a are awarded to this group of people ea can serve 30 years voluntarily, giving weekend, and receive no more recogni you" letter. Ought we not seriously to these people in the honours system? M honours or awards for their everyday the Services. Should we not give more not suggesting that we take anything a but that volunteers should get a bit m

I hope that I have not kept the H these are important matters. I am the who speaks up for this group of peopl I hope that the House will bear with m case. I should like to thank my hon. F Bench—the way in which they look appreciated.

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): This may be a sad occasion for me, as it might be the last time that I take part in a debate on the Royal Air Force—it all depends on when the Prime Minister decides to call the general election.

I have always enjoyed these debates. It is fascinating to reflect on the fact that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I are the only Members in the Chamber who served in the 1939-45 war. In the 22 years that I have been here, there have frequently been substantial numbers of hon. Members facing me who also served in that war.

I draw the Minister's attention to the fact that the hon. Members for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins), for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) and for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) made speeches from which he will draw little comfort, because they told him what is not available in the RAF. I sometimes think that if Back Benchers who are involved in aviation and RAF matters were heeded, we would have a better equipped Air Force.

This also happens to be the anniversary of the Save-the-Baby campaign, in which I have been involved. In the recent extremely bad weather, great rescue services have been provided by the Armed Forces using helicopters. Today, I tabled a massive number of questions in connection with that campaign concerning perinatal death and disability. Could the RAF help one stage further by providing facilities for pregnant women who are at risk? The RAF might get them into appropriate units early. The job would be well worth while—it would prevent handicap and form a useful training exercise for the RAF. [Interruption.]

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am having great difficulty hearing my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) because of the conversation that is going on on the Front Bench below the Gangway.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I hope that if hon. Members wish to conduct a conversation, they will do so outside the Chamber.

Mr. Carter-Jones: I assure you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that they were not troubling me. They would not have stopped me speaking.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I am very sorry.

Mr. Carter-Jones: The Minister took great credit for the new European fighter aircraft, but the battle for the aircraft was fought on the Back Benches on both sides of the House. The Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces ought to be told of the services rendered by Back Benchers who persuaded the Government that the aircraft was essential. The right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) and the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), who were Secretary of State for Defence and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry respectively at the time, will bear that out.

While we were bringing pressure to bear on the Ministry, we were worried about slippage in time, as we were about late ordering. If we wanted to have an agile fighter for, say, 1993, that opportunity has gone. The right hon. Member for Henley eventually decided to go it alone with the Germans and the Italians. The Spanish joined us later. That was as much a Back-Bench effort as one made by the Secretary of State for Defence. There has been tremendous collaboration across the Chamber on RAF matters.

Mr. Bill Walker: We will miss the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Thank you.

We are anxious that the hon. Member for South Ribble can express anxieties about the EFA slipping further away. My little homily has changed a little from my early days in the RAF, but there are three parts of an aircraft nowadays—the power plant, the airframe and the avionics. If we supported our aircraft industry strongly enough, our technology base would be that much stronger. Unfortunately, that is not always understood by the procurement department of the Ministry of Defence. It causes me more worries than our potential enemies. I sometimes wonder whether it is our friend.

We have experienced anxieties about the on-costs of Nimrod. I support the idea of fixed-price contracts, but we should not be too rigid, as technology in this area tends to progress rapidly. If we stick too rigidly to a fixed-price contract, we will miss opportunities to enhance the quality of the aircraft being built.

Perhaps the Minister will take a message back to the Ministry. It is that Mr. Levene may be doing a good job in terms of achieving competition, and he may be trying to eliminate the cost-plus principle, but he ought not to be too rigid or we might find that good developments, which ought to be incorporated, are left out. We have to guard strongly against that.

We have several worries about the EFA. People are hedging their bets. The Germans are not quite so keen and do not have the correct sense of urgency. If we have 1995 in mind as the date when the EFA will be brought into service, we are in danger of losing that target. It is the suggested that we can refurbish Phantom. That seems to be the solution which the Germans have in mind. There is grave danger in that, but it is the sort of thing that happens here. Certain decisions are influenced by things called general elections. It is a funny old world, but that happens all over the place.

As I have said before—this may be the last time I say it in an RAF debate—the Department is heavy on reviews. We have had more than enough of reviews but we have not had the aircraft. We have not had the engine because decisions are deferred again and again. A distinct slippage is appearing in the European fighter programme. British Aerospace is doing a good job and I am convinced that it is ready and willing to continue. We also have a proven engine for the aircraft, the one that powers the Tornado, the RB199. Initially that would be a very good engine for the launch of the EFA. Coming up in the background we have the EJ200, which will be the European jet engine for the EFA.

I must give a warning. I hope that I am not too parochial British about all this, but I am getting worried about people pushing forward American engines, American airframes and American concepts. Unless we are careful we will find that other nations say that they want the General Electric engine in the EFA.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: The hon. Gentleman knows that I share entirely his patriotic view of the importance of buying British. However, does he not agree that we have a substantial two-way street between ourselves and the United States, and that even a former Labour Secretary

[Mr. Gerald Howarth]

State for Defence, Fred Mulley, said that it was not always possible to buy British. Whilst we must be patriotic about these matters, does not the hon. Gentleman agree that it is a valuable two-way street and that a vast amount of British equipment—for example, the Hawk, the Harrier and other weaponry — goes to the other side of the Atlantic?

Mr. Carter-Jones: The hon. Member is wise to remind me of that. He is right, of course. All I am saying is that where we have the appropriate supplies available for manufacture in this country, they should be bought in this country. I have not gone for any alternatives. I have stuck with the view that there is available a superb British engine and its derivative. I accept that this is also the case with the airframe. We talk ourselves down far too much. I reiterate the request of the hon. Member for South Ribble that this project is not allowed to slip. I understand that tomorrow there has to be a submission for the new engine.

I have mentioned the ordering policy. I ask the Minister to bring to the notice of his Department the concern expressed by several of his hon. Friends about the way in which procurement proceeds. It is always tomorrow, never today. Lots of things are not ordered for reasons not always of defence. Perhaps the hand of the Treasury comes in. But the Secretary of State, not the Treasury, is responsible for defence.

On the Tucano, people say over and over again that the Royal Air Force must have the choice to buy what it wants. People say that when it is convenient. It was said, for example, when it applied to Nimrod. But it did not apply to Tucano. I am not saying that the Tucano decision was incorrect but it was not the choice of the Royal Air Force. There has been massive slippage. If the Minister were prepared to say, "We have a problem in Northern Ireland and there is a regional need to supply some economic support," I would accept that argument. I think he will find that on cost and on delivery time the Tucano will come late and more expensive than the Pilatus.

The Minister will have a chance to give us details. I ask him not to hide behind security. There are some questions I want to ask. What is the continuing operating cost of the Jet Provost? That question was raised first in the debate on the Conservative side. The Minister should tell the House about the recent subsidy of £36 million to Shorts. Was that for the Tucano? Quite a few replies should be given before the Minister shakes his head. Many people would like to know the answers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) developed the theme of Pilatus. If it is a case of regional help, the Department should bear in mind the fact that Hull and Humberside are as much in need of regional help as other places.

On the controversial issue, if low-level fast aircraft coming into this country constitute a danger, they are a danger now. The Government decided to buy AWACS. The first one will be delivered in 1991 and the others will come in succeeding years.

Mr. Frank Cook: Maybe.

Mr. Carter-Jones: As my hon. Friend says, maybe. In any case, there are doubts about whether sufficient have been ordered. Again I come back to procurement. I believe that the Nimrod debate was the least informed debate that I have ever attended in the House. The open contract with GEC was a mistake.

I accept that GEC did not perform all that well, but the trouble with the Department responsible for defence procurement is that it does not know when it has won. The Department made up its mind earlier and, as with the fixed-wing aircraft, it could not change. It stuck with its previous decision. However, the improvements which took place in the avionics of Nimrod within the last six months were dramatic. At that rate of progress, it would have been an extremely successful aircraft. If we have no defence at present by way of an early warning system, I am sure that two or three Nimrods, fitted with early warning systems, could provide at least some defence.

The disadvantage of clutter was referred to in that debate, but the clutter was in the arguments that were put forward in the House. People's minds were cluttered and they believed that the procurement section of the Ministry of Defence knew best. Some quite insulting observations were made. I find it strange that people should say that highly skilled Royal Air Force radar navigators are unable to distinguish between a moving target and a lorry. I have never heard so much balderdash in my life. They were comparing something moving at 60 mph with something at mach 2. Any skilled operator could detect the difference. Even I, at 66, with bifocals and glaucoma in my right eye, could spot the difference. GEC is owed an explanation. Just in case somebody feels that because I am throwing around names, I point out that I have no commercial interest in any company in this country.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Shame.

Mr. Carter-Jones: It may be a shame, but I am proud of it. It allows me to say what I want.

The Royal Air Force was not well served on this occasion. I am proud of some of our technical achievements in this sector. It would have been a good launch pad for our new technology in the wider civilian world. We tend to be making false decisions.

The helicopter story is even more disastrous than the Nimrod story. Years ago, Back Benchers on both sides of the House went to see the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement warning him of Westland's cash flow problems. We thought we were warning him. At least we cleared our consciences and told him. I am convinced that he knew already. That company was cruelly deceived. I repeat what I have said before. There was a tremendous row. No. 10 was seething and when the dust had died, two Secretaries of State had departed. However, there are fewer helicopters now than when the row had first started, but the demand and need for helicopters is always there.

How do I end what will probably be my last debate on the Royal Air Force? We should have faith in it. If we spend money training the aircrew, we should give them the best. Do not let some pen pusher in the Treasury make the decision. Do not start having further assessments of the situation. We know the needs. They are loud and clear.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, in every instance where the Royal Air Force has been required to purchase a political aeroplane, it has always turned out to be a flop and has had to be replaced expensively later on?

Mr. Carter-Jones: I shall not be tempted down that path because my knowledge is not good enough, but I have a suspicion that the hon. Gentleman may be right. The Ministry of Defence is the trustee of the nation's security. If it trains the staff, it should make sure that they have the appropriate equipment at the appropriate time.

8.2 pm

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) in these debates, not least because he usually manages to cover at least half the points that I intended to cover and enables me to speak more briefly. Like my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) I shall concentrate largely on procurement issues. Therefore, I apologise to the House for the fact that I shall be adding to the library of acronyms that have been used so far.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement rightly referred to the Harrier GR5 as one of the more exciting technological prospects open to us as a nation. However, it is not just the aircraft that is in the forefront of technology. A number of aspects of the development of the aircraft and the equipment that will go on it are themselves keeping British technology at the sharp end of where aerospace technology is going.

In particular, I am thinking of the Pegasus 11-16 engine, which was successfully tested last year and is expected to be available in a production prototype in 1990, which has been proposed to the United States Secretary of Defence and on which a reply is expected shortly. I should be grateful for any pressure that the Government can bring to bear to ensure that this latest state of the art engine will be used, not just in the GR5, but for further developments in the Harrier.

In equipment terms, and again looking both at the Harrier GR5 and the Tornado, I should like to draw the attention of my hon. Friend the Minister to the development of TERPROM, the British Aerospace terrain reference navigation system, which has been successfully demonstrated on both the F16 and the Tornado. It has huge export potential, especially in the United States of America and other NATO nations. It would be suitable for the Tornado and GR5, and again is British technology at its best. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will look closely at this project, particularly as I understand that it could be ready for demonstration on the Tornado in the current year.

My hon. Friend the Minister was warned that the flavour of the night in the speeches of some of my hon. Friends is advanced short take-off or vertical landing aircraft. I do not wish to repeat the comments already made by my hon. Friends the Members for South Ribble and for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth). However, many Conservative Members are anxious at what appear to be developing—delays and possible lack of interest. We look forward to the most positive reassurance that my hon. Friend can give.

The project that has occupied much of the debate is the European fighter aircraft and its engine. My hon. Friend the Minister will not be surprised to learn that I wish to push him fairly hard tonight on the engine for the European fighter aircraft, both in its preliminary version and in its eventual version, because I hope that both engines will largely be built at Rolls-Royce in my constituency. Few people in this country believe that the logical choice for the initial engine for the EFA can be anything but the RB199. It is a proven engine with 500,000 flying hours. By the time of the first flight of the EFA prototype it will have notched up 1·5 million flying hours.

When the experimental aircraft project was flying, the RB199 was performing to specification within that project. I thought when I visited Farnborough last year that the sympathies of the audience went out to the manufacturers of the French plane, the Rafale, which, unfortunately, on the day that it was being shown against the experimental aircraft programme did not perform to specification. These things happen, and I am sure that we do not wish to make too much of it. In its existing version, the RB199 is European high technology which represents European employment and competitiveness. Its likely development into the EJ200 will continue to keep us at the forefront of technology.

Work has already started at Rolls-Royce on the development of the EJ200 and I know from speaking to the work force there that they have the highest hopes for this engine. They believe that this engine, with Rolls-Royce's reputation and the technical specification that has been agreed, promises to be a world beater. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will apply all the pressure that he can to ensure that the RB199 is given a fair crack of the whip, subject to satisfactory quotes for the initial engine —I understand that the quote from Turbo-Union is highly competitive—and that we can proceed as soon as possible with the EJ200 engine.

So far, this debate has been relatively friendly. Therefore, I apologise for now wishing to introduce a note of controversy. I am particularly sorry that, having been in his place for most of the debate, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) is no longer in his place, not least because I wrote to him at the end of last week and advised him that I intended to raise the subject of a speech that he made in my constituency and attack him about it. I am sorry that he is not here to take the opportunity to respond.

On 10 December last the hon. Gentleman made a speech in Bristol—I am not quite sure where because, unfortunately, the hon. Gentleman did not let me know that he was going to Bristol or to what part of Bristol he was going. From a newspaper report, I understand that he visited Rolls-Royce in my constituency. The newspaper report states:

> "The European fighter aircraft, on which thousands of Rolls-Royce jobs may depend, will almost certainly be cancelled by the Conservatives to help pay for Trident".

This subject was raised in a debate in the House on 12 December. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North was repeatedly challenged to state the basis for his wild statement to people whose jobs depended on the subject about which he was speaking. The only basis that the hon. Gentleman could find was that no contract had yet been placed for EFA, but, as my hon. Friend the Minister pointed out to him in the same debate:

> "We are committed to playing our full part in the . . . project . . . It is self-evident that we cannot order the European fighter now because there is no aircraft to order". —[Official Report, 12 December 1986; Vol. 107, c. 725.]

That was the last that we heard on the subject. I accept that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North may have made a genuine mistake or may have been desperate for something to say about Labour's defence policy that would not put him under attack, and chose to instil totally unnecessary fear and panic in my constituents and those of other hon. Members in surrounding constituencies.

[Mr. Michael Stern]

They believe that the RB199, the EJ200 and EFA together represent their future employment and security. They were told by a Front Bench spokesman for the Labour party that that security was under threat. It may simply have been desperation on the part of the hon. Gentleman, but I suspect that it was more than that. That was not the first time that EFA had been attacked by the Labour party in Bristol.

About a year and a half ago, when the EFA negotiations were at their height, Avon county council, which was then controlled by the Labour party, passed a resolution and insisted that copies of it be sent to all Members of Parliament for immediate action. I am delighted to see that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North has returned to his place. In its resolution, Avon county council suggested that, because of potential expenditure on Trident, the British Government were about to withdraw from the EFA negotiations and that as a result a substantial number of jobs at Rolls-Royce would be lost.

The Avon county council's resolution reached me on the same day as the Government announced that the negotiations had been concluded. Had the Labour party in Avon listened to what was said to it by the company, and by the work force, and had it listened to the sound political advice that it received, it would have realised that the resolution was complete nonsense. However, clearly, the Labour party considered it to be more important to poor-mouth EFA, to create confusion and distress among the employees of Rolls-Royce and to do as much damage as it could. I accept that, in the absence of a positive policy, if the Labour party chooses to attack a flying project, that is up to it, but my suspicions go deeper than that.

I should like, with your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to draw a parallel from slightly outside the subject of the debate. About two years ago, rumours started to be spread—we know not from where—that in his next Budget the Chancellor was about to announce major changes in the pension taxation policy and, in particular, that he was about to announce that pension lump sums would be taxed and that tax relief on pension contributions would be reduced. The Chancellor was not in a position to deny that charge in the period before the Budget. Many other hon. Members and I received one of the largest post bags ever, purely because of the rumours that were spread from we know not where. In due course the Chancellor announced that he would never have done such a thing without a Green Paper, and never would have considered it anyway.

It is significant that, about a year later, quietly in a speech to the National Association of Pension Funds, a Labour Front Bench spokesman announced that it was official Labour party policy to tax pension lump sums and to reduce the tax relief on pension contributions. That remains the Labour party's policy. My constituents and I fear that this is a pattern: Front-Bench Labour party spokesmen and important Labour party officials announced that the Conservatives will do something extremely damaging. I invite the hon. Gentleman to reply, now that he has returned to his place.

Is this anything more than a smokescreen to get defence spending down to the targets that Labour Members will set if they come to power? Is this a smokescreen that demonstrates that they intend to cancel EFA? After the hon. Gentleman's speech, my constituents are entitled t an answer to that question, and I invite him to intervene The hon. Gentleman does not wish to intervene on thi subject.

Mr. McNamara: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman i I catch Mr. Deputy Speaker's eye.

Mr. Stern: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for tha intervention. He has created considerable fear among m constituents. In common humanity, he owes them slightl more of an explanation of his unjustifiable comments tha he has given so far. I hope that if he suceeds in catchin your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he will offer that greate explanation.

8.18 pm

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Th hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr McNamara) does not require me to defend him from th hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern), and shall not try to do that. I shall not break my self-denyin ordnance of not speaking publicly about the internal issue of the Labour party. I do not wish to take up procuremen issues. I had not intended to speak about strategic issues either, which are relevant to debates concerning the RAF but I have been provoked by the hon. Member for Walsall South (Mr. George) and the hon. Member for Tayside North (Mr. Walker).

On the strategic issue, there is a tendency for ou defence and services debates to be weapons led, t concentrate on military hardware and tactical deploymen and not to be related to the broad political and militar realities that are part of any rational debate of our defenc policy. The speech of the hon. Member for Walsall, Sout was a particularly fine example of the way in which whole scenario can be constructed on the basis of complet political unreality. I hope that the hon. Gentleman' speech will not result in a massive evacuation o Copenhagen this evening. The people of Denmark will b able, I believe, to sleep soundly in their beds, in the certai knowledge that there will not be a Soviet invasion. Tha kind of scenario leads only to more cold warrio approaches. It encourages the cold war attitude, and i leads to a mutual failure to understand and to mutua hostility.

Our debates on defence issues have to relate not just t procurement but also to arms control. In Royal Air Forc debates we recognise that the complexity of moder weapons systems leads to dual capability. The Tornad GR1 and the Buccaneer squadrons that are located in th United Kingdom and Germany are capable of bot conventional and nuclear operations. As we look to th ordering of further Tornado squadrons, we see that th immediate air defence of the United Kingdom wil inevitably become interconnected with NATO's strategi role. It is very difficult to distinguish between strictly ai defence roles and offensive roles.

In that context, I turn to the environmental impact o our defence policies. My remarks follow on from th speech of the hon. Member for Tayside, North, wh unreservedly supports the present low flying militar training policy. The Minister will not be surprised to hea that I shall return again to this subject. It is the one abou which I receive most complaints, not only from visitors t my constituency but also from residents. I make thes complaints not as a criticism of the military options that the training exercises imply. I make them on the basis of the increase in training and also on the basis that other NATO countries, particularly West Germany, apply much tighter rules than we do to low level training. It is ironic that when RAF pilots carry out exercises in Germany they have to operate under much tighter rules than when they are operating over the air space of England, Wales or Scotland.

Since 1977, there has been a significant increase in the number of low-level flights over the United Kingdom. According to parliamentary answers that I have been given, there were 76,000 movements in 1977, whereas there are now over 130,000 a year. The last full year figures that I have are those for 1983, when there were 128,000 low level flights over the United Kingdom. The increase does not take into account the environmental damage that British pilots cause to the residents of North America. The people at Goose Bay in Canada are affected by military training. The residents of Nevada also suffer from the training exercises of the USAF, which are augmented by British training.

In 1979, the Labour Government's Minister with responsibility for the Royal Air Force, James Wellbeloved, changed that policy. Instead of there being a number of designated low-flying areas, with link routes mapped out, the whole of the country's land area was made available. We were told that this would ensure that the disturbance was spread more evenly. However, James Wellbeloved also said that the low flying system was "too small to meet the demands made upon it."

We know now that the reason for the change in 1979 was not to spread the load more evenly. It was to ensure that the far greater number of training requirement movements that were necessary could be accommodated.

We are told that heights and speeds have changed. Before 1977, there was no low flying below 250 ft and at more than 450 knots. New areas were created then, some in central Wales and others in the north-west of Scotland. There was no consultation; the RAF does not require planning permission for these exercises. The legal basis of low flying is being examined; there is no clear definition in law of the Ministry of Defence's responsibility.

Apart from the designation of those new areas, and also additional areas in Cumbria and Northumberland, there is now low flying at 100 ft and 480 knots. Since 1977 there has been a substantial increase in night low flying, which causes serious concern to many people. It is 10 years now since a tragic crash just over the boundary of my constituency, when USAF airmen were tragically killed and a farmhouse was nearly the subject of a direct hit. That tragic accident occurred during night flying. As these night flying exercises increase, so public concern increases. Tornados and F111s are now permitted to fly automatically as low as 200 ft at night in bad weather.

I have to emphasise the contrast with West Germany. That is an environmentally conscious and "greener" country than the United Kingdom. That may be the reason for the controls in West Germany. Germany, a NATO country, is committed to the NATO strategy, but it is able to minimise the environmental impact of low-flying. The general height limit there is 500 ft. There are seven specific low-flying areas where low-flying is permitted down to 250 ft only. There is a general ban on low-flying at weekends. For some years the number of low-level flights has been constant at 110,000 a year. Further restrictions are being introduced. Skyguard mobile radars detect and deter infringements. A new ban was introduced in 1986 on low-flying in the middle of the day. A new system has been introduced this year, which will create 49 new low-flying areas, each of which will be used for a few weeks and then closed for several months to give the residents some peace. Speaking on behalf of the residents of the Snowdonia national park, most of whose area falls within my constituency, they would love to feel that they could have peace, not just on an occasional Sunday in summer.

There is a free-for-all low-flying training policy in the United Kingdom, and increasingly it is becoming environmentally unacceptable. The issue is being addressed not just by the peace movement. It concerns the environmental movement in general. The Council for the National Parks is very concerned about it, as are individual national parks. It is being pronounced upon by the farmers' unions. It is not an issue that the Ministry of Defence can fob off, as though it has been raised merely by the peace lobby.

The United Kingdom now has an opportunity to review low-level flights. I have asked the Department on previous occasions for reviews, but I have been unsuccessful in obtaining a review. However, the important NATO committee on the challenges to a modern society is studying aircraft noise. I have asked both the Department of the Environment and the Ministry of Defence questions on this issue. I was surprised to find that apparently the Department of the Environment is not represented on this committee. Presumably Defence is the lead Department, and no doubt part of its function is to keep a check on the environment.

The committee was initiated by the West Germans. It is also staffed by the United States and was set up because of anxiety about the impact of low-flying. I hope that the study is looking at the issue in terms of solutions and in terms of minimising environmental impact, and that it is not merely some sort of PR exercise. Does not the United Kingdom look rather bad when measured against the efforts and initiatives taken in West Germany to lessen environmental impact? I hope that there will be a clear United Kingdom commitment to the work of this committee, that we will not try to prevent or frustrate any positive recommendations by the committee about inspection and control, complaints procedures and environmental monitoring.

I hope that the study group is investigating the United Kingdom's system and our controls and comparing them with other countries. I also hope that the RAF and the Department will take seriously the need to minimise environmental impact as more emphasis is placed on faster and lower flying and on more night flying. Perhaps the Minister will reply to me in this debate or in detail in writing. I draw his attention to recent information from Germany about the public perception of low-flying.

The December issue of the West German Tribune published a poll in which half the people questioned said that they did not believe national security depended on military aircraft practising low-flying. More significant is that, of the people questioned in the Rhineland Palatinate area of West Germany, 30 per cent. felt that their health was affected by low-flying, one in six had insomnia and 3 per cent. had been to a doctor because of aircraft noise. Some 29 per cent. saw the aircraft as hazards to safety and, as I say, nearly 50 per cent. said that there was no direct connection between their national security and low-flying training. In the poll 28 per cent. said that they had been shocked by the noise at a particular time and eight out of 10 people said that low-flying aircraft were disturbing them.

There are no surveys of that kind conducted in the United Kingdom. I suggest that the Department should conduct such surveys by commissioning a reputable independent polling organisation, of which we probably have too many these days, to conduct that kind of survey so that we can assess public feeling and can move towards greater environmental controls. We need to review not just training and the environmental impact but also the complaints procedure. I am grateful to the Minister for the way in which he replies in detail to complaints made by my constituents.

A complaint was made to me by a former RAF person about the alleged use of after burners by F111s flying over my constituency. When the Minister does reply in detail I shall be grateful to him. An independent complaints system which did not necessarily involve Ministry of Defence personnel would engender more public confidence and would be like the more independent systems that we have in other areas of public life. I hope that the Minister will take my complaints seriously because they are not coming just from a minority party in one area of Britain but are complaints which can be made by many hon. Members who represent rural constituencies.

8.33 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas). As he rightly said, defence must be placed in its political context. The political context about which most people are aware is the overwhelming conventional and nuclear predominance of the Soviet Union. The hon. Gentleman is a member of a minority party and is privileged because he is able to ignore national political opinion, but his colleagues in the other opposition parties will have more difficulty about that.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about low-flying aircraft. Like him, I represent a rural area and I assiduously represent my constituents' views and complaints about low flying to the Minister, who always replies most courteously, promptly and in great detail.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): If ineffectively.

Mr. Leigh: Not ineffectively, because as a result of representations it is clear that the RAF is made to sit up. I made representations about low flying over a certain primary school, and I hope that they have done some good. In general, while most of my constituents may have complaints about low flying and aircraft noise, they recognise that those things are the price of freedom and they are prepared generally to put up with them.

I want to deal with just one aspect of this debate—the air defence of the United Kingdom. Unfortunately, he has had to leave the Chamber, but it was a privilege to listen to the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones). My generation owes his generation and yours, Mr. Deputy Speaker, a great debt and I do not need to repeat the obvious lessons of history about the role of the RAF in the defence of the United Kingdom. There are disturbi parallels between the situation that faces us today and th which existed in the 1930s.

First, Britain's air defence area is vast. It covers an ar of about 4 million square miles and is 1,000 miles fro north to south. I picked up an interesting artic containing the views of Air Marshall Sir Peter Harding. H speaks with considerable authority and he said:

"If the enemy is going to attack, he will have to attack sufficient numbers to swamp our defences."

He also said that more than 500 aircraft would be involv at the peak of the battle.

The hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) a other hon. Members said that we face a quite frighteni conventional threat. I am not talking about nucle weapons. [Interruption.] I cannot hear the ho Gentleman because he is mumbling.

Mr. Wilson: If there were to be any effective attack, would use ballistic missiles.

Mr. Leigh: Not necessarily. It is a great mistake assume that there would immediately be an escalation in nuclear weapons. That is why an essential part of o deterrent is our ability conventionally to deter. T maintenance of our fighter squadrons is very much a pa of that.

It has already been said that the assets of the Soviet armies include no fewer than 180 Bear and Bison bombe 145 Backfire bombers, 397 medium-range Blinder a Badger bombers and 450 shorter range Fencer stri aircraft. That is a quite frightening resource and one mu ask why the Soviet Union thinks it needs such a lar offensive capability. Against that capability we have ju nine fighter squadrons, and two of those are based in n constituency at RAF Binbrook. They are the Lightni squadrons. The Lightning first came into service in 196 so it is an old aircraft.

I shall say something about RAF Binbrook later in m speech because it is of special local concern. Before I de with that perhaps I could put a number of points to t Minister. He could reply to them later in the debate or letter. In September 1985 there was what I hope was successful exercise, Exercise Brave Defender. It was t largest exercise on home defence since the second wo war. I was made aware of this exercise, if I had not alrea known about it through the press and by being inform by the Minister, because a heavily armed platoon soldiers tramped through my back garden in Lincolnshi without any advance warning. As with aircraft noise accept that that is the price of freedom.

I am especially interested in the Soviet Spetnatz fi columnist threat. We read of disturbing rumours about t number of Soviet troops being trained in this capabili and in an area like Lincolnshire, with a number airfields, we take this threat seriously. Perhaps later in t debate, or in a letter to me, the Minister can give me update on how the relatively new concept of a grou defence area around our Royal Air Force airfields is bei developed. Perhaps he can tell us how he thinks t Territorials can cope with the almost insurmountab logistic problems that are posed and how we can possib hope to seal about 3,000 miles of coastline. I should li my hon. Friend the Minister to comment on poli primacy. I understand that it is envisaged that ordina police would play a major role, and I wonder wheth progress has been made.

I want to ask about pilot shortage, which was dealt with by the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright). As the Minister will know, I am a member of the Select Committee on Defence. On 21 May 1986 I asked a question of Air Chief Marshal Sir David Craig. I said:

"I am told that the pressure on aircrew numbers is such that no less than 208 ground jobs are empty at the moment in order to ensure that sufficient pilots are kept in their cockpits. Is that right?"

At first he was not prepared to answer me. However, he then said:

"I can give you an order of figure. It would be about half that."

That is serious. In a written answer we were told that 58 officers had joined the premature voluntary retirement scheme. It has been written elsewhere that the RAF may be short of 200 pilots. Clearly, that is serious. There was an interesting article in Jane's Defence Weekly, to which reference has already been made. It suggested various reforms in recruitment policy. The House would be grateful for any comments that the Minister can make on that.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I do not know whether a tribute of any sort has been paid to Sir Humphrey Edwardes Jones. He was a flight lieutenant in 1936 and was responsible for vetting and giving the go-ahead to the Spitfire. He died only two or three days ago. His obituary is in The Times today, and in the context of what my hon. Friend has said this might be an appropriate moment to pay a tribute to him as a great man at a time when we really needed people of that calibre.

Mr. Leigh: My hon. Friend makes a well-timed intervention and I am sure that the House will concur with his remarks.

Mr. Frank Cook: On the issue of aircrew and their availability, would the hon. Gentleman care to comment on the opinions that I heard from our RAF aircrew in western Germany about the great attraction for them to follow the export of British produced airframes to the middle east to train Arab aircrew and to serve in Arab air forces? Is that not a drain in addition to the shortage that has already been mentioned?

Mr. Leigh: There have always been some RAF pilots who have helped middle east air forces. I was in Oman as a member of the Select Committee looking at operation Swift Sword and I was very impressed by the quality of the Omani troops and pilots and by the dedication and hard work of our own RAF personnel in the middle east. They are a credit to this nation.

Mr. Bill Walker: Is my hon. Friend aware that between the wars the Royal Air Force policed the middle east and developed a relationship with the Arab countries, and that post-war the RAF has been involved in the middle east and has lent people on a regular basis to middle eastern countries?

Mr. Leigh: That is a good point. It is a matter of regret that our influence in the middle east is not wider than it is, and we all know the reasons why.

The main pilot drain will be not to the middle east, but to the United States. Recently I read that the United States would be recruiting about 6,000 pilots for its commercial airline operations in the next couple of years. That is an extraordinarily high figure.

I now want to deal with the Tornado. I was aware of the problems with the radar before they became public knowledge, because several Tornado pilots are my constituents in Lincolnshire. Without going into great detail, which would embarrass them and the Government, I must say that it is a serious issue. It has been mentioned several times, notably by my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins). We do not want another Nimrod fiasco. The sums of money involved are large and the Tornado is vital to our defence. It is in the interest of the Government to come clean at an early stage.

I want to mention briefly United Kingdom air defence ground environment. It is an important project. I believe that about £1 billion of public money is involved. The House would welcome further details of that. I can only speak from having read newspaper reports, but I understand that, unlike the radar on the Tornado, the scheme is a success story. It would be no bad thing to be told more about it.

The people of Lincolnshire have long been associated with the RAF. They are proud of their traditions with the RAF and are determined that the associations should continue. Therefore, I must deal with the future of RAF Binbrook, which is a historic and famous RAF base. It was founded as long ago as July 1940, 10 years before I was born. It has been the home in recent years of RAF Lightnings. Everybody in Lincolnshire knows that these planes are rapidly becoming obsolete, in spite of the fact that they are excellent and have given superb service. We all know that they have to be replaced.

The problem is similar to the difficulty that we face with Tornado radar. It is incumbent on Ministers to take local people into their confidence as early as possible on the possible closure of RAF Binbrook. Local people know that the Tornados are to be based at RAF Coningsby. They know that RAF Binbrook is rather too close to RAF Coningsby for operational efficiency. They know that there are difficulties with the so-called Humber gap, which has to be filled. They know, because I have taken pains to tell them, that the Ministry has been seeking earnestly for two years to find an alternative role for RAF Binbrook. I understand that the decisions are to be made soon, perhaps in February. At an early stage I hope that Ministers will take the Member representing RAF Binbrook and the local people—105 local people work at the base—into their confidence so that the future of the base can be explained. At the very least, local people would want to know that the base will be kept in some form, perhaps as a war reserve airfield.

The people in Lincolnshire are proud of their associations with the RAF and want them to continue. I shall end on a controversial note, by saying that I have no doubt that when the general election comes, whenever it may be, the people of "Bomber County" will not elect a Government who seem determined to throw away defences and freedoms that have been built up painstakingly over so many years.

8.48 pm

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): I feel honour-bound to begin by paying a tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones). His contribution to the debate was offered in his usual pointed and pertinent style and with his customary reasoned and logical presentation. I commend that contribution to the House.

[Mr. Frank Cook]

There are many aspects of this subject to which one could refer. I want to confine my remarks to an area of examination around conventional weapons vis-a-vis nuclear weapons. The House may recall that during the debate last week on the Army I took the opportunity to contrast the need for adequate conventional equipment, which is sorely lacking in our Army units generally and in the central European sector especially, with the total inadequacy of nuclear preparation in terms of armament for conflict on that front. I took issue with the foolishness of claiming that the possession of nuclear weapons was a deterrent, when it is obvious that we cannot use them without condemning our own personnel to a premature death and condemning the countryside to a long-standing sickness of radiation. On that occasion, the Government spokesman failed to counter that thesis, so I offer it for comment later tonight.

I posed another question at that time: if we were making reference to deterrence, what were we trying to deter? Were we seeking to maintain a deterrence against Soviet invasion, or were we trying to maintain a deterrent against American withdrawal, as suggestions by certain American spokesmen might lead us to believe? I reminded the House that, regardless of the stated need from leaders of our forces in West Germany for conventional weapons, nuclear deterrence remains the order of the day, and that has not changed in the last week. Tonight, I ask the House to ponder the thesis that nuclear weapons are not only inadequate as a deterrent; they are also unnecessary. That thesis can be summed up as: "Who needs nuclear weapons when your adversary has a nuclear installation?" That is not a new thesis, but it might bear closer examination tonight.

A graphic reference to the type of scenario to which I refer was made as early as 1976 in the sixth report of the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution, which was chaired by Sir Brian Flowers. On page 123, paragraph 314, it is stated:

"We have given some thought to the possible effects of war so far as nuclear installations are concerned; these installations, providing vital energy supplies, would be prime targets. In a nuclear war the effects of attack on nuclear installations would be one part of a general catastrophe, but an attack with conventional weapons leading to the release of radioactivity would produce some of the effects of nuclear weapons. The quantities of fission products that could be released are vast and they would not be carried up into the stratosphere."

I pose the question again: "Who needs nuclear weapons when your adversary has nuclear installations?"

"The effects of war, even of 'conventional' war, are inevitably horrifying, but if these effects could be magnified by attack on nuclear installations, then this is a major factor to consider when deciding whether, or to what extent, to use nuclear power."

That is very wise counsel.

"The unique aspect of nuclear installations is that the effects of the radioactive contamination that could be caused are so long lasting. If nuclear power could have been developed earlier, and had it been in widespread use at the time of the last war, it is likely that some areas of central Europe would still be uninhabitable because of ground contamination by caesium."

That is the considered view of the Royal Commission. As a result of reading that, certain questions were posed to the Government as early as October 1985. I want the House to know of these inquiries and to know of response. The questions were phrased in the foll form:

"Would there be a catastrophic release of radioa from a nuclear power station if: (a) it suffered a dir from one or more conventional bombs; (b) it suffered miss from a conventional weapon; (c) it suffered a dir from a weapon such as a bazooka style rocket launche an aircraft crashed onto the station?"

That was the nature of the inquiry. The reply, da November 1985, from the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Waldegrave), at that time a junior Enviro Minister, was:

"I think I can do no better than to let you ha attached copy of his letter, which explains that nuclear stations are built to withstand the sort of accident or you envisage."

Two days before that, I received a letter dat November 1985 from the hon. Member for Edd (Mr. Goodlad), at that time an Under-Secretary o for Energy, who stated:

"In particular they aim to prevent release of radioa in the worst credible accident; . . . nuclear power stati built in such a way that they would withstand a large of aircraft crashes and direct hits from conventional r without any release of radioactivity at all."

Those letters may be reassuring to my grandchild children a little older than that, but can we believe t Royal Air Force — that had the skill, tenacit courage to fly down the main streets of occupied co and lob bombs through the doors of G headquarters; that had the piloting expertise to d bombs on German prisons so as to breach the w liberate prisoners of war incarcerated there; that d bombs on the Möhne and Oder dams to such deva effect—or other air forces cannot penetrate the in of nuclear installations? Am I to accept, without qu two ministerial responses that are so clearly fatuo

So many of the existing 120 nuclear installati western Europe are clearly unhardened targets. So of them, we already know, do not even have a f secondary containment to guard against bluebott alone bazookas. Is not such blind disregard simply and somewhat irresponsible diversion from a real weakness within our own resource? Is not the vali my further arguments in the Army debate ever obvious?

If we need nuclear deterrence at all, does n potential enemy, whichever nation that enemy tu to be, already have our nuclear deterrence possession? Is not our commitment to the nuclear w programme, as I said on that occasion, simply a m ensuring the consignment of even more billions British taxpayers' earnings to the bottomless bun the American armsmongers so that they can g assure us, as they do, more bang for a buck?

Is it not true that the only sensible policy in eco moral, employment and tactical terms, and, in terms of the balance of payments, is the adoption policy enunciated by the Labour party?

8.59 pm

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I wan a few words about helicopters. I may tend to stra the narrow confines of the debate, but I think th know well, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that there is wit Ministry of Defence a group of people who don sor which they call purple. That means that they represent the all-arms view of defence strategy. My speech will be something of a purple speech.

During the first world war, the balance of advantage initially, and almost to the end, was with the forces of defence. Mobility was impossible until the development of the tank. The tank, which had protection and mobility with it, changed the course of the end of that war. The reign of the machine gun was replaced with the reign of armour. That sea change happened then, as it has happened many times in history before, where one type of weapon system has predominated for a long time until it has been replaced with another. Other examples, as well as tanks and machine guns, are the English archer and gunpowder.

What I shall say now is intended to be provocative; thought-provoking rather than didactic. I do not want to dictate to anybody. It is a thesis, not a programme. I believe that we have reached another of those turning points. The age of the tank in many circumstances is virtually over. In today's warfare, the tank is the most expensive and the heaviest high-tech coffin that has ever been invented. We are now reaching the age of the battlefield helicopter with its two main roles. It has a role in attack, in anti-tank attack, and as a helicopter gunship. It also has an assault role as a means of moving quickly, to wherever the threat is greatest, reinforcements of men and supplies, and, in particular, anti-tank missiles.

The classical use of armour was in the role of the blitzkrieg—the punch: knock a hole through the enemy lines. In the previous war, particularly on the Russian front, the tank, in blitzkrieg attack, with its strength, protection and mobility, was a powerful instrument indeed. But now that protection, size and power are its signature and that signature gives its position away on modern radar and surveillance techniques.

The relative mobility of the tank has been replaced, now that we have more air mobility, with relative immobility. If an enemy were intent upon a major tank attack—a blitzkrieg—and got all its tanks together to try to force a punch through, concentrated, those tanks would be seen from a great distance by surveillance. They would be seen and could be engaged by armed helicopters from a distance well beyond the range of the tank. The tank would not know that the helicopters were there. As the tanks concentrated—and that would take time—all that movement would be "visible". The helicopters could concentrate much more quickly. A helicopter, with its missile, could take out tank after tank after tank without the tanks being able to do anything about the helicopter whatever.

Of course, there is the other role of the tank—the role of the tank in defence—holding ground. If a tank is dug in, it is a very good defence against armour. The infantry dug in in the past was never such a good defence against armour. The Energa grenades were pretty well suicidal. The Wombat and the Mobat, with their telltale back blast, were almost as dangerous to the user as to the tank they were taking on. But new infantry missiles score every time. As techniques develop, they will, with even more certainty, be able to take out enemy tank as effectively as with direct tank fire. But, as I have said before, the helicopter standing further back will be an even more formidable weapon than the tank.

That is a defence against tank attack. Times and circumstances change, with the likelihood in the future of many more airborne attacks. A tank has to be in the right defensive position. If it is not in the right position, how is it going to get there? The relative mobility of the tank in previous military circumstances has been lost. The battlefield is covered by obstacles. The tank cannot move because of those obstacles. It cannot move across rivers or through thick woods. It moves relatively slowly. A helicopter flies across woods and rivers and is much more mobile, faster and more effective.

It is useful when considering such changes to ask what other forces have done. The Americans in Germany, in their corps, have four times as many support helicopters as we have. The Russians have as many if not more helicopters than the Americans and are developing a formidable array of attack helicopters. In 1982, there was a confrontation in the Beka'a valley between the Syrians and the Israelis. Looking at the relative rate of attrition between helicopter and tank in that confrontation, the Israelis took out 30 tanks for every helicopter lost, and when the Syrians had the helicopters they took out 15 tanks for every helicopter lost. They are overwhelming figures.

When the age of the tank commenced, the premier strategist was an Englishman, Liddell Hart. Yet the technique for using tanks was developed first not by the British but by the Germans. The reason for that was the institutional nature of the German armed forces, being totally different from ours. The Germans had a general staff that was not bogged down with factional lobbies but was able to take an overall view and develop a grand strategy where that strategy was needed. In the United Kingdom there was reluctance to pursue the necessary changes because of the bastard marriage between bad tradition and vested interest lobbies. I believe—and if my informants are right, it is so—that the same problems are appearing today. There is inflexibility of inter-Service budgets, loyalty to arm, the vested interest, including the promotion structure of brother officers in similar regiments.

Mr. Frank Cook: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Marlow: I will not, because there is a shortage of time and my hon. Friend wants to follow me.

Those problems block progress of tactical development and equipment ordering programmes. Cavalry generals promote cavalry generals. Cavaliers love their tanks as they used to love their horses. It is time that we did away with the "cavalry" and all its paraphernalia.

War was conducted by a combination of amateur villeins and yeoman on foot and gentlemen on horseback. It may then have been proper to lend a bit of tone to what might have been otherwise a vulgar brawl. We now live in an age of professionals. Equestrianism is no longer useful as a military skill. Sums spent on military equipment are scarce, and necessarily so. It is vital and essential that we spend it on the right equipment. We need more helicopters and fewer tanks. We always make the mistake of preparing for the last war. This time we must prepare for the next.

We learned lessons in the Falklands about our vessels and the way they were equipped. Elementary mistakes had been made, which we realised as soon as the hot war was upon us, but it was the peacetime structure—vested interests, the lobby, the nature of the Ministry of Defence—which provided those vessels in that conformation. Let us not make the same mistake in ordering military equipment in the future. We should have more helicopters. Where are we going to get them? We have, in Westland, our helicopter industry. We all know that Westland is faced with an order gap. Not only do we need Westland to build our helicopters for the future, we need it to maintain the helicopters we have at the moment. We need Westland to keep together its technicians and design team.

I ask the Minister to give some good news soon about providing a work load for this very important task of our defence industry. When we have the helicopters I am sure the Minister will put in the right order for the necessary equipment. The helicopters are deployed. Who is going to control them? At the moment, the heavier helicopters in Germany are run, maintained, with training programmes and everything else, by the Air Force. We have had eloquent arguments from this side of the House that they should be run by the Army. Conservative Members have argued eloquently for this and given the example of the Royal Navy, which controls its own helicopters. Use of helicopters by the Royal Navy has no peer in the world.

Similarly, a formation commander in the Army wants to have helicopters under his command and not need to borrow them. He wants to have his helicopters to develop his strategies, take his risks and integrate his forces in his formation and to make the necessary decisions to develop future strategy.

I add to my hon. Friend's plea that the military helicopters in the armed services used in BAOR-type formations should come under the command and control and have the uniform of the Army rather than of the Royal Air Force. Of course there will be co-operation, and men from one Service will go on another Service's courses, but the time has come to introduce this change.

9.10 pm

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): I know that hon. Members want to hear the concluding speeches shortly, so, in the brief time available, I shall concentrate on one major subject. Before doing so, I should like to express my appreciation, as have other hon. Members, of the tremendous performance of the Royal Air Force in the Oman exercises. It was a remarkable example of the skills used in operating the Tornados. In that out-of-area exercise we saw five to seven mid-air refuelling operations with Tornados flying all over Oman. The turnaround time was amazingly fast. The operation reflected well on not only the pilots and their training but the aircraft, which demonstrated that they were high in the world league table.

The subject that I wish to raise follows a question asked by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara). I should like to persuade my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to respond to my comments on satellites. I do not intend to talk about the so-called "spy" satellites, partly out of deference to the ruling which Mr. Speaker made earlier, and partly because the relationship between the article in the New Statesman and the current state of play with my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General is not entirely known to me. I hope that my remarks will help to keep in perspective what some of us see as some of the more glaring errors in the reports that we have read so far.

We are all aware that there was a major hole in our defence capability when we did not have a Skynet capability. During the Falklands campaign fortunate that the Americans took the view th that we had co-operation. Had such co-operati available, we would have been without a crucia That is why the questions that have been pose launching of Skynet are so important.

I should declare my interest as a parliamen to the space and communications division Aerospace. I welcome the splendid news Aerospace and Marconi are to extend their lin to NATO satellites. This development is evi high technological capability in this count especially important illustration of our defenc in that forward programme.

There are three satellites in Skynet—4A, I understand that the first was to be laun shuttle. Obviously, that programme has be because of the problems with shuttle launch c satellite's design was not compatible with Ar shuttle. There is a lesson to be learnt from th —it is unwise to put all our eggs into one b of us who argued in favour of modifications t either launch capability would have been appr been proved, regrettably, to be correct. W satisfaction in pointing that out.

The first of Skynet is due to be launched That will inevitably mean that the second sate look to Ariane for its launch. That would pr also to the third satellite.

Those three satellites are part of a whole c They are designed to provide communicati military purposes. It is clear to anyone who three satellites that their basis is interrelate one, especially, is now significant because of mark relating to the shuttle launch that applied to the first. In that context argumen existence of a third Skynet can most clearly be

What has now been announced on the NA is a major breakthrough for British industry, constituents take particular pleasure. Al Portsmouth will see some direct work in Ma at Stevenage will see an extension of the lin £170 million contract which will provide a value added work for sub-contractors thr country. That is all good news. It is part Kingdom defence satellite capability which b the future. I hope that when my hon. Friend replies he will give us a little more informatio indications of likely dates of the shuttle lau

I shall touch briefly on the so-called Briti Suggestions have been made that, because delay, the possibility of a British astronaut our launch activity has in some way been would be sorry if that were the case. I h Minister can confirm tonight that such is not that matter is still under consideration, an when we see—as we hope we shall—the s confirmed once again, there will be an oppor resumption of the original training program to be exercised for Squadron Leader Anything that the Minister will say on th welcome.

At present we envisage some difficulties o of a British astronaut for the NATO satellit clearer about launch capability. But I am a that, again, we should not be ruled out on because we see largely British built satellites within NATO by definition the astronaut must come from some other country. I do not wish to make too much of what was perhaps meant in a lighthearted way by the distinguished air vice-marshal, who suggested that "even a Turk" might be applicable, but NATO must keep a broad and open view. If, by that time, British astronauts have direct payload experience—as is made possible through Skynet—let us try to ensure that they are available and the most obviously qualified candidates for the NATO satellite.

Within those requests to the Minister I have tried to encompass briefly what seemed to be some facets of a most important development for British industry in the widest context. Many hon. Members believe that the spin-off from military to commercial satellite construction has great value. It is part of a development that I hope will continue over the months that lie ahead. It is in that regard that many of the reports which are now being bandied about on spy satellites should be viewed. Those are the matters that really concern us tonight. They put into perhaps the widest possible context some of the more sensationalist and, I believe, schoolboy howler sort of reports that we have seen before us today.

Mr. McNamara: Hon. Members have addressed several questions to me, so I shall start by dealing with them and go on to the philosophical matters behind the debate.

The hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) asked how our non-nuclear policy would enable our forces to sink deep-running Soviet submarines. We have had this out in the past and I shall give an answer from Noel Gaylor, a United States admiral. He said:

"The most concrete objection is that any initial use of nuclear weapons at sea would be very much to the disadvantage of the Allies, because we are the outfit with the big ships and we are the outfit largely dependent on service ships to keep the seas open. The differential advantage we might get from going after a submarine with a nuclear depth bomb is just not worth it. In addition it has the interesting characteristic that if you blow one beneath the surface of the sea, you will ring the ocean acoustically for several hours and lose the capability to track anybody. As a tactic that is soft-headed, deeply obnoxious—and militarily futile."

Mr. Bill Walker rose——

Mr. McNamara: With great respect, I have little time. In other words, the American admiral is saying that faced with a shoal of nuclear submarines, if we hit the first one, the others would come through because the sensors would not be working.

Mr. Bill Walker: Conventional forces cannot sink them.

Mr. McNamara: Why, then, are we wasting so much money on Spearfish and Sting Ray which are specifically designed for that purpose? That is what we have been told by both Marconi and the Government.

The hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) raised several questions. Because the Trident project is spread over 20 years, the Government argue that the average proportion of defence resources that it takes is limited, and that between 1980-81 and 1999-2000 it will take only 2·9 per cent. of the total defence budget. However, that statement is misleading, because Trident spending will not be spread evenly over the 20 year procurement period. Seventy-eight per cent. of the total spending, or £7·3 billion, is due in the decade from 1986. In that period Trident will account for 4·5 per cent. of total defence spending, 10·4 per cent. of total equipment spending and 17·2 per cent. of new equipment spending.

Therefore, using Ministry of Defence figures, we can calculate that total defence spending, excluding Trident, will fall by about 11 per cent. in real terms between 1984-85 and 1989-1990, which will return conventional defence spending to its 1982-83 level. Thus total equipment spending, again excluding Trident, will fall by about 23 per cent. in real terms in the five years from 1984-85 to 1989-90, which means that conventional equipment spending will return to about its 1980-81 level. The new equipment spending, again excluding Trident, will fall by about 30 per cent. in real terms between 1984-85 and 1989-90 and by that year the level of real spending on conventional new equipment will be lower than in any year since 1979-80.

With the unit costs of all new weapons rising, many difficult decisions must be made. In recent years, by keeping its head firmly below the parapet, the RAF has been able to maintain, and indeed secure greater increases in, equipment growth. As a result it could be argued that to avoid cuts in the surface fleet or BAOR the RAF should be cut. That immediately brings into question the future of the European fighter aircraft programme, on which the Government have said that they have no firm contractual commitment and that the total cost could be £9 billion. If that programme were delayed or cancelled or the size of the British order, estimated at 250 planes, reduced, it would enable large savings to be made in the RAF's budget in the early 1990s.

There is no firm budget commitment or undertaking on the EFA. Therefore, we are entitled to say, knowing how the Government will write in White Papers after the general election—whatever the Government—that some crucial decisions must be taken and the EFA programme could well be at risk. I say to the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces, if the Conservatives win the general election and keep Trident, there is a real chance of losing the EFA programme. I must remind the hon. Gentleman's constituents who work in the defence industry that their jobs are not sacrosanct. The royal ordnance factories, the royal dockyards and British Aerospace and its factories thought that they were safe. There is no reason why Bristol workers nor any person employed in conventional industry should feel that their jobs are safe under this Government.

There have been some strange statements about Labour party policy and the Government's attitude to it. On the suggestion that we would leave 1st Corps unprotected, I shall ask the questions that we sought to ask in last week's debate; they are fundamental to that attitude and we have not yet received answers to them.

What nuclear weapons or facilities are under the control of 1st Corps, British Army of the Rhine and can be used unilaterally? The answer is none. Not one weapon can be used without the say-so of the United States. The Russian hordes can come over and run across all our men, seize everything, and threaten to come up Whitehall, and we will not be able to use those weapons without American consent. It is not us, but our American allies, who are reducing the strength of BAOR. If Conservative Members had the courage, they would admit that. Instead, they go on the myth that we have a nuclear capability which

[Mr. McNamara]

BAOR can use without the say-so of the Americans. We cannot therefore go along with the Government's thinking.

Although we have some fine new weapons for the RAF such as Tornado — the Government talk a great deal about what they are doing—we should consider the cost of spending so much on nuclear weaponry. We have 1951 Shackletons, 1956 Jet Provosts, 1958 Buccaneers, 1955 Victors, 1963 Wessexes, 1971 Pumas, 1967 Harrier GR3s, 1967 Phantoms, 1959 Lightnings, 1968 Nimrods and 1951 Canberras. That is a collection for the air museum and it is the cost of spending so much on nuclear weapons.

It is disgraceful to suggest that the Labour party's policy is neutralist. It is not. I welcome the Secretary of State, who is laughing, to the debate. With the resolution in favour of unilateral nuclear disarmament which the Labour party conference accepted by a two thirds majority on a card vote, which means that it becomes party policy, was a resolution in favour of continued membership of NATO.

Sir Antony Buck rose——

Mr. McNamara: With the greatest respect to the hon. and learned Gentleman, I shall not give way. I have given up 10 minutes and have promised not to take too much time so that the Minister can get in a lot more information.

There seems to be an idea that the Labour party's suggestion that we should look again at the concepts and strategies of NATO is strange. Do the British people have a choice? We are saying that they do. They can go along with nuclear policy, which will weaken our conventional forces and lower the nuclear threshold, or they can strengthen our conventional forces so that we can play our proper role in NATO, as we are best able to do.

The idea is not peculiar to the Labour party—it has occurred to Caspar Weinberger who said at the National Press Club:

"Most of the concepts that shape our thinking about what forces we need and how they would be used were formulated in the 1950s and early 1960s . . . The world has changed so profoundly since the 1950s and 1960s when most strategic ideas were formulated that many of these concepts are now obsolete."

I do not claim Caspar Weinberger as a sudden convert to unilateralism, but I do claim that he sees the intellectual choice and military problems which face NATO in the 1990s and the 21st century.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) was at the core of the creation of many of these policies in the early 1960s when he was Secretary of State for Defence. He said:

"There is now a growing feeling among military experts that NATO must look in a different direction—towards a non-provocative strategy of conventional deterrence which could protect NATO territory without using nuclear weapons if deterrence should fail. We in the Labour Party share this feeling."

Are we wrong to say to our allies, "Stop. How far do you expect us to go along this road?" How can we afford the money, the forces, the treasure and the expertise to go along that road? It would be far better to draw back and to try to consider the consequences of that decision. It would be far better to stop, and at least to think about it. That is the Labour party policy. We are asking our NATO allies to sit down and consider whether this policy is the proper one.

After Reykjavik, George Shultz said:

"We may be on the verge of important approach to the role of nuclear weapons in

In November 1986 he went on to say:

"It may be that we have arrived at a true The nuclear age cannot be undone or abo permanent reality but we can glimpse now, fo a world freed from the incessant and pervasive devastation . . . a nuclear defence strategy th threat of escalation to the strategic nuclear co an unwelcome solution to ensuring our natio George Shultz was discussing the United S security. That decision is based on that na rather than our own or European national is in Europe that the first line of the battle Conservative Members may criticise us, they will continue to do so—but they sho behave as military dinosaurs. They should the possibilities and the principles upon w their policies. I can understand if Conserv come to a different conclusion from o arrived at after honest and rigorou examination—but they should not doubt honesty of our interpretation. The momen they are saying that half the population of not want Trident, are dishonest. Are they to the country and say to half of the people, of you are too thick and too dishonest to all about"? That patronising attitude electorate is absolutely disgusting.

The hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Binbrook in his constituency, said that the an overwhelming preponderance of co nuclear forces. That is not true. If it was that any of us would be here today. International Institute of Strategic Studies the military balance in 1986-87:

"The overall conventional balance contin make military aggression a highly risky und With regard to conventional capability Cas said:

"As this report illustrates, contrary to som does not suffer an unmanageable initial weak conventional combat power."

So much for the assessment that the R many tanks that they could come over in o wipe us all out. We in turn have our anti-t bean count does not work.

General Bernard Rogers said:

"The advantage is with the defender and t pact) will give us credit for being strong ourselves credit for."

Conservative Members who attack our the Americans will go home if we follow The Americans will go home only if they longer in their national interest to be he Americans have bases here or not they wi they have reached that conclusion. If considered such bases to be in their natio Government, they would be wrong no decision. Caspar Weinberger said:

"US forces are maintained in Europe di of US political and military interests — n charity towards our allies."

The Minister who opened the debat understand what Labour party policy Minster spreads what, in other circumst termed a big lie, that we are neutralists, i Labour party is committed to the defenc by land sea and air. That commitment is greater than the commitment of the Government who are willing to risk everything on the nuclear gamble. They are prepared to allow our conventional forces to be run down to such an extent that in the end the only way we can defend ourselves will be to use a very low nuclear threshold. That will be the consequence of the hon. Gentleman's policy.

Let no Conservative Member doubt Labour's commitment to the defence of Europe and the positive role it will seek to play within NATO. Let no one doubt Labour's determination to maintain a proper contribution towards the collective and nuclear defence of the country. Far from being a contradiction, our policy of a determined and strong membership of NATO, unilateral nuclear disarmament and no nuclear bases in the United Kingdom, is the direction in which we think that NATO will move. That is the direction in which we will seek with increasing acceleration to draw our NATO allies on both sides of the continent.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) has made perhaps his last speech in an RAF debate. He was proud to defend his country. If he were fighting the next election, he would be equally proud to go to the hustings on such a policy.

The Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Roger Freeman): This has been a wide-ranging and serious debate and I shall try to answer as many as possible of the questions that have been raised. My officials advise me that well over 100 questions have been asked. My hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) has probably accounted for 25 per cent. of them. In regard to those questions that I cannot answer because of shortage of time, I shall read the debate carefully, as will my colleagues and we will write to all Members, on both sides of the House, who have raised questions and try to answer them as fully as possible.

Before attempting to answer some of the questions, may I devote a short time to answering one point referred to by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) in his opening and closing speeches about the resources available to the Royal Air Force. When he was opening the debate, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement described the range of roles and activities undertaken by the Royal Air Force. They are essential to the effective defence of the United Kingdom and to this country making a worthwhile contribution to the NATO Alliance. This Government have, over their period in office, substantially increased the resources devoted to this end.

The defence budget is substantially larger in real terms than when we entered office, and the proportion of that budget spent on equipment has grown from 39 to 45 per cent. since 1979. The RAF's share of that budget is some 30 per cent. in the current year. In real terms the RAF has benefited greatly from this Government's policies. Excluding Falklands costs, expenditure on the RAF in 1986-87 will amount to £5·4 billion, which represents an increase in real terms, using Ministry of Defence cost deflators and not the retail price index deflator, of 21 per cent. since 1978-79. The Government need no lectures from the Opposition about strengthening conventional forces.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) asked about noise compensation. It might be helpful if I remind the House briefly of the policies recently produced by the Government to deal with this important problem. We have introduced a noise compensation scheme to alleviate the nuisance military aircraft cause in the vicinity of military airfields. Depending on the location of the house affected, the compensation that is paid by the Ministry of Defence in these circumstances may take one of three forms.

First, a grant to cover the cost of acoustic secondary double glazing is paid when noise levels are at least 70 decibels over a 12-hour period, and in addition special account is taken of night flying. Secondly, we offer to purchase where dwellings are subject to exceptionally high noise levels; for instance, where properties are subject to 83 decibels or more over a 12-hour period. Finally, compensation for the depreciation of property value is offered. The district valuer of the Inland Revenue assesses this compensation to ensure that the sum of money paid is independently assessed. My hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton mentioned in particular the noise survey at RAF Cottesmore. I am hoping to have the report in February and to consider extending the scheme in a few months time.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Sir A. Buck) asked about Hawks and potential sales to Venezuela. I understand that British Aerospace signed a contract to supply Hawks to Venezuela in 1982. The Venezuelans did not proceed, but both the Ministry of Defence and British Aerospace remain hopeful that they will decide to proceed with the purchase.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North raised a number of points, and I shall try to deal with the major ones. In one point he was joined by the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) and my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh). They all referred to the loss of pilots in particular, but officers in general, from the Royal Air Force through what is called premature retirement. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North said that he detected a lack of urgency in the Ministry of Defence in dealing with this problem, but that is not true. I shall briefly explain how we are tackling this problem with great vigour.

It might be helpful if I corrected the impression that the hon. Gentleman gave that this problem is getting worse. Far from it. The latest statistics are good news. I shall deal first with all officers and then with pilots in particular. For the 12 months ended 31 December 1985, the number of officer exits as a percentage of the total trained officer strength was 2·7 per cent., but in the most recent 12 months, in the year ended 31 December 1986, that percentage has fallen to 2·3 per cent. I am glad that there has been that reduction for all officers, and it is true also of pilots. In the year ended 31 December 1985 the number of pilot exits as a percentage of trained pilot strength was 2·1 per cent., and for the most recent 12 months, ending 31 December 1986, that percentage had fallen to 1·9 per cent. That is good news about pilot exits.

We all understand the reasons for these exits and in previous debates, the hon. Member for Woolwich has alluded to some of the factors. The push factors are the turbulance of service life, and this is not just a feature of RAF life but applies to all three services. There are some criticisms of conditions of service, particularly in the RAF. The gratuity that is paid to pilots at the eight-year point when, if they are on 12-year commissions they have the right to leave, creates distortions. My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) referred to some of the pull factors, the main one being the attractions of the airlines and British Airways in particular.

What are we doing about the problem of exits, which I hope I have shown is a little less severe than it was a few years ago? We have taken three measures. First, as regards turbulence, we are extending the tours of RAF pilots and officers. That should give a greater stability to family life. Secondly, as the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North said, we have appointed a two-star officer to study the terms and conditions of service of RAF officers, and in particular to see whether we can learn any lessons and identify problems. Finally, we are looking at some of the allowances, such as those that relate to the movement of officers and men, and at some of the separation allowances.

Mr. Cash: Will my hon. Friend also pay tribute to the maintenance depots, such as that at Stortford, and to the fact that the maintenance of the RAF is as important as the retention of officers, pilots and others?

Mr. Freeman: I gladly pay that tribute. Unfortunately, the issue has not been raised in the debate. I hope that we can return to the important issue of maintenance.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North also raised the matter of the Tucano. My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North and the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) also alluded to this. I am sorry that I was not in the Chamber when the hon. Member for Eccles spoke. I pay tribute to him. As I understand it, he is one of the last hon. Members who fought in the second world war. We shall miss his contributions.

My hon. Friends will be aware that the first Tucano rolled off the production line a couple of days ago. Boscombe Down will receive two aircraft for trials and evaluation in a few months. The company predicts that two aircraft a month will be delivered to the RAF, starting in May. Training of the first Tucano squadron is due to begin in the summer of 1988. Delivery of the first aircraft to the Royal Air Force will be a few months later than originally planned, but we hope to recover some of this lost time later in the programme.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North asked also about AWACS. He asked whether six Boeing aircraft would be enough. Obviously in reaching any major procurement decision, affordability is a major consideration. Six of the E3As can be accommodated within the available defence budget provision, whereas eight will pose more difficulties. A decision on whether to exercise the option on the further two aircraft will be taken in the light of the outcome of the annual recosting of the defence programme on which the Department is currently engaged.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North asked about the Foxhunter fire radar for the Tornado. My hon. Friends the Members for South Ribble and for Gainsborough and Horncastle also asked about this matter. Concern has been expressed by the Ministry to GEC Avionics about slippage in the programme. The company has agreed to aim for accelerated production. We are also discussing with GEC the resolve the problems associated with th and demonstrate acceptable perform future. Our aim will be a mutually a contract.

The hon. Member for Kingston up asked about the GR5. The size of the is under consideration. Orders for cer were placed last year, and a decision o will be made in the next couple of mo

The hon. Gentleman and my hon. for South Ribble also asked abou aircraft programme. It is our intenti Ministry of Defence funding of the e programme should be as part of the programme on an international basi awaiting proposals from industry on used in this context.

Mr. Robert Atkins: Does my hon. that pressure needs to come from Ministers within the four-nation consc the other three countries are prepared has a vital role to play in the Eurofighter?

Mr. Freeman: The Official Report the concern expressed by my hon. Fr one of the procurement Ministers has he said, not only in his intervention,

My hon. Friend the Member for (Mr. Wiggin) spoke generally abou helicopters — he was joined by m Member for Northampton, North specifically about the control of supp is the argument about whether co helicopters should pass, in part, from to the Army.

My hon. Friend the Member for referred to the 1985 reorganisation Defence, whereby operational req sidered centrally. He talked about pu at the Ministry of Defence. This rec any risk of capabilities which cross S being given their rightful priority. I my experience in the Ministry of Defe case. Nevertheless, the Government matter and are bearing very much Committee's views as expressed in i I have just said was reiterated by my Secretary of State when he set o position not only in the debate on Government's response to the third the Select Committee.

The hon. Member for Woolw condition of married quarters and that 70 per cent. of them are below This is a very important issue importance to it not, only when I planning the allocation of Ministry In recent years the Government increasing resources to improving th Service men. A comprehensive undertaken to modernise the acco service men, at a cost of over £170 years. We have also been devoting modernising the RAF's married quarters estate. We plan to spend £16 million on improving married quarters in this financial year, with a planned investment of the same order in each of the following 10 years.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the Government's attitude to defence against short-range ballistic missiles. We shall study Hansard with great interest, because the hon. Gentleman made detailed contribution to the debate. He is right to draw attention to this threat. It has to be taken very seriously. The existence of the threat is an illustration of the range and diversity of the dangers against which we have to structure our defences, but the nature of the appropriate response is difficult and complex. There is a range of possibilities. The hon. Gentleman referred to many of the considerations that have to be borne in mind. The NATO Alliance—and undoubtedly the hon. Gentleman's own alliance—is considering this issue carefully, and the United Kingdom is naturally playing its full part in that consideration.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble raised what seemed to be well over a quarter of the outstanding questions that I have yet to deal with. I shall deal now with three of the most important ones and will certainly respond to the others. The first related to ASTOVL. The United Kingdom signed a memorandum of understanding last year to exchange information on national studies on development technologies, including propulsion systems and advanced flight control avionics. The ASTOVL aircraft is seen to be a potential replacement for the Sea Harrier, the Harrier GR5 and the Tornado GR1, but we are at an early stage in our studies and cannot commit ourselves to any particular system.

My hon. Friend also asked about the NATO IFF. This is a very complex area, as he suggested, and it is not surprising that discussions within NATO have proved to be protracted. The IFF system, to be carried on ships, aircraft and ground weapons systems, is currently under project definition. I shall write to my hon. Friend in greater detail on the matter.

My hon. Friend also asked about the consequences of the diversion of the Tornado aircraft to the Saudis, and asked for an assurance, which I shall now give him, that this will not prejudice the Royal Air Force in terms of the ultimate number of aircraft that it will receive or, indeed, the cost. All the replacements for the RAF's programme will be received by the early 1990s.

The hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) asked about the United Kingdom mobile force in the context of the transportation of that force to the central front, or at least on the northern part of the central front and the northern flank. The Government are committed to making efforts to improve output from the considerable resources that we devote to defence. In this context we are discussing within NATO whether, in its present role, the United Kingdom mobile force represents the most effective use of those resources. The financial implications of any change in current deployment plans depend on the outcome of the confidential discussions that are under way in NATO, the outcome of which cannot yet be predicted.

As for the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), I pay tribute to and acknowledge the fact that his commission in the Royal Air Force Volunteer Reserve has been extended to the age of 60, which is many years off. We thank and congratulate him on his many years of valuable service to the Royal Air Force. He has vast experience and has raised a number of detailed questions on gliding schools, which are m by volunteers. I welcome the opportunity to pay trib the work of these men. They do a tremendous encouraging the enthusiastic youngsters who go to to learn to fly. The RAF give all the support that to the gliding schools and we are aiming to expand activities to whatever extent this can sensibly be don hon. Friend referred to a number of specific pro about which I shall write to him in due course.

My hon. Friend also referred to air cadets, a that is dear to my heart because in my own consti of Kettering there is an excellent contingent of t Training Corps. As my hon. Friend knows, the derives a proportion of its recruits from the ATC. I the number of ex-ATC cadets expressed as a percent the total RAF intake was: officers, 33 per cent., airm per cent., and apprentices 41 per cent. It is clea entrants to the service with an ATC background decided initial advantage in training over those wit and wastage is likely to be less.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North (Mr. Stern) has important constituency interests in Royce and British Aerospace. He expressed clearly House his aspirations for the two engines, the RB19 the EJ200. His concerns are noted, and I know th hon. Friend in defence procurement listened t contribution with special care.

The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conw Thomas) explained that he had to leave the House the conclusion of the debate. He spoke about low aircraft, as did my hon. Friend the Member for T North. It is a problem, but it is not getting worse judged by the number of complaints from the publ from hon. Members, and also in terms of the flying and the number of missions flown. Nevertheless, i important problem and, as my hon. Friend the M for Tayside, North knows, we have changed the s My hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mar Wiggin) will be familiar with this problem, beca dealt with these issues with great care and diligence he was at the Ministry of Defence. We changed the about 10 years ago from the system that the Germa have.

I must take issue with the hon. Memb Meirionnydd Nant Conwy, because he is wrong. My hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Mr. Ma asked about Skynet. [Mr. Freeman] from a Shuttle to an Ariane launch in order to meet as early as possible the urgent military requirements for improved satellite communications.

It is also planned to launch Skynet 4C on Ariane. Although the subsequent failure of an Ariane rocket on 31 May has led to delays in that programme, there has been no further revision of the basic launch strategy for the Skynet 4 satellites. Skynet 4B will be the first of the three satellites to be launched in May 1988. Skynet 4A is still planned for launch by the shuttle, but the most recent date offered by NASA is July 1990. As a consequence of the delay in the shuttle programme, the United Kingdom payload specialists—that means the people who go in it—have returned to normal service duties for the time being. It is intended that when circumstances permit selected members of the team will be recalled when appropriate for refreshment training to enable a United Kingdom payload specialist to fly on the shuttle mission during which Skynet 4A is launched.

Perhaps it is appropriate for me to concentrate my closing remarks on the contribution made by the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook). I shall then have done justice to all hon. Members who contributed to the debate. He argued that nuclear weapons are unnecessary. The Government's policy is quite clear. It is that an effective defence policy needs conventional and nuclear weapons. These are the weapons possessed by the forces of the Warsaw pact and it is important to duplicate them for our forces. The Royal Air Force needs a nuclear capacity. I put to the hon. Gentleman a question that was not answered in the debate on the Army. If the RAF loses its nuclear capability, will the risk of aggression by Soviet pact forces be more, or less?

Mr. McNamara rose——

Mr. Freeman: It was a rhetorical question, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows. Conservative Members believe that there will be a greater risk from the strategy of the hon. Member for Stockton, North. Labour party policy is dangerous and will be rejected decisively by the electorate.

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Language Training (Wolverhampton)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Ryder.]

10 pm

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the issue of language teaching at Colton Hills school at Penn in my constituency. Associated with that is the question whether the Secretary of State for Education and Science should exercise his powers under section 68 of the Education Act 1944 and hold that the compulsory teaching of Punjabi is, in the circumstances, unreasonable.

Colton Hills is a comprehensive school on the edge of my constituency and it serves the ward of Penn. Some 54 per cent. of pupils are of Asian origin. At the beginning of the autumn term, parents of pupils in their first and second years found to their surprise that the pupils were required to attend Punjabi lessons as part of a language awareness course.

A significant minority of the parents objected when they found that the course was compulsory. The question is whether the Secretary of State should hold that the governors of the school and the local education authority acted unreasonably.

I would contend on a wider basis that compulsory attendance at Punjabi lessons is unreasonable. There are several reasons for that. Teaching Punjabi in Britain, or England, does not help pupils to understand or work in the English community. As you know better than most in the House, Mr. Speaker, Punjabi is not the language of all the Asian people. Punjabi has little practical application for most pupils in England.

As a Tory I draw upon tradition. The tradition of groups in this country, such as the Jews and, in more recent years, the Poles, has been to encourage the teaching of their language and culture in private lessons and not to all pupils in state schools. Forcing white, West Indian and some Asian children to learn Punjabi against their will and against the will of their parents has stirred up resentment against Asians generally.

Once the parents, who realise that the teaching is to be compulsory, hear of it being part of the curriculum of any school, there will be a tendency for those parents to exercise their choice by sending their children to other schools. In the example of Colton Hills school, we shall find that when parents who disapprove of the course are fully aware of its continuance—if the Secretary of State allows it to continue—they will exercise their choice, send their childen to other schools, and, sadly, the percentage of Asian children at Colton Hills will rise above 54 per cent. That can only be to the disadvantage of the Asian children.

The governors and the local education authority at Wolverhampton contend, with massive simplicity, that they have no prejudices. They assert that they are motivated only by a broad benevolence and an open-minded consideration of all the facts.

For my part, I recognise that my views may be wrong and prejudiced. I concede that they may not even be approved of by a minority of other parents. However, the Secretary of State may not be prepared to hold that the teaching of Punjabi, upon a compulsory basis, is generally unreasonable. But I hope that he will look at the special circumstances of the introduction of the course at the school. I hope that he will hold that the way in which the LEA and these governors have stuffed their apparently liberal, but actually authoritarian, prejudices down the throats of these parents is unreasonable.

If the governors were to initiate the course upon a compulsory basis, they should have prepared the ground with care, but they did not. First, most of the parents were not given a copy of the prospectus. Secondly, the prospectus was ambigious on the question of whether attendance at Punjabi lessons was compulsory. Thirdly, no other attempt was made to prepare the parents and children for that compulsory course. Fourthly, the suggested compromise that the course should be made voluntary for this year only, in view of the failures of preparation, was rejected out of hand.

Fifthly — perhaps this is a wider and more serious point — the objectors to the course were treated with arrogance and abuse. From an early stage they were dismissed as racists, and those who accused them of being racists did not bother to explain what they meant. They merely thought that they would be cowed and frightened by that silly unspecific abuse and that they, the accusers, would be able to assert that they had a superior education and culture.

If it is thought that I exaggerate, I hope that the Secretary of State will consider the way in which the charges that I make were admitted by the chairman of the governors. First, I shall refer to what the chairman of the governors said about the prospectus. In a letter to me, he wrote:

"I am sure that you are aware that such documents are accurate at the time of writing. Almost always there are variations which are subject to further separate consultation."

I hope that Councillor Jones does not get a job in the City — bearing in mind the present climate — because if he did, and if he tried to justify prospectuses in such loose and generous terms, he might find himself either the chairman of a large merchant bank or in Winson Green, but I doubt whether he would find himself anywhere much between those places. Secondly, the chairman of the governors issued a press statement in which he said:

"Advance communication of the details of the course was not as extensive as the head teacher and governors would have considered ideal."

You may recollect, Mr. Speaker, that I, in a spirit of good will, suggested that there was a compromise. Well, that compromise was dismissed without argument. The chairman of the governors said:

"We feel that any attempt to make part or all of the language awareness course optional would only be damaging to the educational interests of the pupils concerned."

We were impertinent enough to ask for further and better particulars of that very general statement. But, of course, it would be too much to expect such important people to give the mere parents further details of their thoughts. They left it at that.

I contend that the governors and the local education authority have acted unreasonably in refusing to allow the course to be voluntary, at least in this academic year. But there are wider and more important issues that I wish to end by referring to. If the Secretary of State does not deal with this issue in a firm and decisive way, the problem will not stop here.

I have not troubled you, Mr. Speaker, and the House with the extensive and damaging literature which has been issued by the Labour group and by the governors of the school. It is obvious from the general philosophical remarks, which they put forward as though they were self-evident and obvious, that they intend, if they get away with this, to extend these compulsory courses to all the comprehensive schools in Wolverhampton.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will realise that if he allows these parents to be patronised and abused without check or hindrance, it will be seen in Wolverhampton as a signal. It will be the thin end of the wedge. It will be the signal for the general introduction of Punjabi on a compulsory basis in all comprehensive schools in Wolverhampton. All the parents in Wolverhampton demand the Secretary of State's protection from the social engineering which is the hallmark of the dominant and aggressive Labour group in Wolverhampton.

10.12 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) for drawing this matter to our attention tonight and in the current issue of the Spectator. In the article and again tonight he has made some interesting comments, in his usually lucid way. I know that the case has produced strong feelings, and it might be helpful for the issue to be debated more widely in order that the implications and consequences of actions taken can be understood and noted by others who may wish to go down a similar route.

My hon. Friend has asked the Secretary of State tonight to consider using his powers under section 68 of the Education Act 1944, and my hon. Friend has already written to my right hon. Friend with that request. The Department has been making enquiries of the local education authority and a full reply will be sent to my hon. Friend as soon as possible. Meanwhile, I welcome the opportunity to examine some of the main aspects of the case.

Let me begin by telling the House the circumstances as I understand them. Colton Hills school is a community school. That means that it provides school education for its pupils during the normal school day and offers educational, social and leisure facilities for all members of the community after school, at weekends and in the holidays. One of the benefits of that arrangement is that it should give the school an opportunity to develop closer links with its pupils' parents. That point was made by my hon. Friend tonight and it strikes a chord immediately with me.

One of the benefits of this arrangement is that it ought to give the school an opportunity to develop closer links with its parents. The events to which my hon. Friend referred are not going down that road. The provision of Punjabi lessons at Colton Hills is apparently nothing new. Punjabi is one of the three main modern language options available from the 4th year onwards. The other two are French and German. At this level, none of the languages is compulsory; but of the present 250 fourth year pupils, 50 take French, 47 German and 22 Punjabi. All these languages are available to public examination level at 16-plus. For second and third year pupils, German is compulsory. In the third year, however, some pupils have the opportunity to take a second modern language which may be either French or Punjabi. So the teaching of Punjabi as a voluntary part of the modern languages curriculum is well-established at the school.

[Mr. Bob Dunn]

How is it, then, that the Punjabi lessons described by my hon. Friend have attracted such anxiety? These lessons were introduced in September of last year. They are part of what is called a "language awareness course" which is being taken by all first year pupils and which is organised in four nine-week modules. Three provide an introduction to a particular language. These are the languages which are offered later as full-time options—French, German and Punjabi. Modules run concurrently and pupils rotate between them; their experience is drawn together in module 4 which considers the structure of language as a whole. For each child, the time devoted to Punjabi is five periods a week over the nine weeks in question.

The course is not an isolated initiative. It is part of a wider programme to improve the teaching of modern languages at Colton Hills. The initiative came from the headmaster, but I understand that he was acting with the full support of the school governors and the local education authority. I understand also that the course will be regularly monitored by LEA inspectors and that the headmaster will make a report to the governors at the end of the summer term.

I should like to comment here on language awareness courses generally. Properly structured, these aim to give pupils both a general introduction to foreign languages and some basic linguistic skills. However, such courses are a fairly recent development and their educational merits are still a matter for debate. The necessary time often has to come from that which is normally devoted to the first foreign language taught and schools need to consider carefully — very carefully — whether this time can be spared without detriment to later studies. Let me emphasise, however, the importance of consulting parents. Education has always been about extending children's experience and deepening their understanding through contact with subjects which may at first be unfamiliar. But, where schools are seeking to change what they teach, they must take the parents with them.

In the present case, it seems that parents were involved only once the course had begun, and this was clearly wrong. Three meetings have taken place since, on 28 October, and on 7 and 25 November. I am told that each attracted a substantial audience, with strong views expressed both for and against. But I believe that much anxiety could have been avoided through better information before term began. The governors have said as much themselves; their statement of 26 November accepts that:

"mainly due to difficulties associated with the recent teachers' dispute, advance communication of the details of the course was not as extensive as the Headteacher and Governors would have considered ideal. The Governors recognise this and will attempt to ensure that this situation is rectified in future."

Then there is the question of the school prospectus. My hon. Friend suggested that it was misleading. It is true that there was no mention of language awareness courses in the last edition, but the authority tells me that, when this was published in autumn 1985, no firm plans for the course had been made. If that was the case, and knowing that the issue was so very sensitive, it might have been better to consult, to inform and to make the position clearer in the prospectus. Clearly, it would have helped matters enormously if the course had started less precipitously and after it had been promulgated in a changed published prospectus.

My hon. Friend has requested that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State should intervene, using his powers under section 68 of the Education Act 1944. Section 68 empowers the Secretary of State to act where he is satisfied that any local education authority or the governors of any school have acted or are proposing to act unreasonably in the exercise of any of their functions under the Education Acts. The judicial test of what is unreasonable is very stringent. It has been defined in the courts as conduct such that no sensible authority or governing body, acting with due appreciation of its responsibilities, would have decided to adopt.

Within the meaning of section 68, it must be proved that the authority or governors have acted unreasonably. The lessons in question were introduced by the school with the support of the governors and the LEA. Some 220 pupils are involved, but the LEA says that only 12 formal complaints have been made to the school. Clearly, there is room for more than one opinion about the value of the course. I shall write to my hon. Friend about section 68 and his appeal under it.

The governors accept that there was a lack of consultation. For the future, the new Education Act should help to prevent any repetition of the difficulties which have arisen at Colton Hills. Strengthening the links between parents and schools is one of the main planks of the Act. Governing bodies of county, controlled and maintained special schools will be reconstituted to broaden membership. In particular, the number of parent governors will be increased so that parents have equal representation with the LEA. There will also be what for many schools will be a new category of co-opted governor representing the community served by the school. Colton Hills already has both parent and co-opted governors, but the numbers of both will be increased under the new arrangements. The new governing bodies in all county schools must be in place by September 1988.

Furthermore, the Act also requires every governing body to produce an annual report and to hold an annual meeting for parents to discuss it. Parents will be encouraged freely to express their views and to participate with governors in a full and business-like discussion. Therefore, it will be open to parents to raise any matter which concerns them. The first such meeting must be held in schools before the end of the summer term 1987.

The Act also makes curriculum policies much clearer and more open to public scrutiny and debate. LEAs will have to publish their own curriculum policies, and will be clearly accountable to the local electorate for them. Governing bodies in county and controlled schools will also have to establish aims for the curriculum of their school and may, if they wish, modify the LEAs policy in respect of the school.

The headteacher retains under the Act the responsibility for organising any curriculum and securing that it is delivered. He is constrained by the LEA's overall policy, but, if that has been modified, he can choose to follow the governors' modification.

All three partners will be acting under much closer public and parental scrutiny than in the past. The publication of curriculum policies, annual reports from governors to parents and the annual meetings with the parent body will help to ensure that no curriculum policy will be adopted or sustained unless it can be fully justified and commands wide support.

I thank my hon. Friend for bringing this matter to the attention of the House and for the robust and clear way in which he delivered his remarks.

Question put and agreed to.

BILL PRESENTED

SOCIAL FUND (MATERNITY AND FUNERAL EXPENSES)

Mr. Secretary Fowler, supported by Mr. Secretary Edwards, Mr. Secretary Rifkind, Mr. Peter Brooke, Mr. John Major and Mr. Nicholas Lyell presented a Bill to empower the Secretary of State to prescribe, under section 32(2)(a) of the Social Security Act 1986, amounts, whether in respect of prescribed items or otherwise, to meet maternity expenses and funeral expenses: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Monday 26 January and to be printed. [Bill 55.]

Orders of the Day

Agricultural Training Board Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

9.35 am

Mr. Gerrard Neale (Cornwall, North): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I thank my hon. Friends and those Opposition Members who have jointly sponsored the Bill. There is a common view on both sides of the House that acclaims successes in the agriculture industry, but there is also a common view that expresses concern about the need, as a result of that success, for farmers to think of other ways of earning income because of the need to curb the surpluses that are now occurring. I should also thank my hon. Friend the Minister and his officials for the advice that they have given me in the preparation of the Bill.

It is a short and, I am sure hon. Members will agree, non-controversial Bill. It is designed to enable the Agricultural Training Board to offer, on a fully commercial basis, training in various rurally related activities not previously within its scope. The offer will be made to all those employed in the industry and their families and will enable farmers to diversify their businesses. The board will also be able to offer those outside commercial agriculture and horticulture training in what I have referred to as amenity skills.

Before going into greater detail about the content of the Bill and its effects, I should like to set the scene by outlining the history and background of the board. Although I am sure that many hon. Members are aware of the existence of the board and its functions, I am equally sure that there are many, especially those in urban and suburban constituencies, who may not have had an opportunity to become familiar with its activities

The Agricultural Training Board was established in 1966 under the Industrial Training Act 1964. That Act provided for the setting up of other industrial training boards, each dealing specifically with training for workers in its own sector of employment in Britain. In common with the various industrial training boards set up under the 1964 Act, the Agricultural Training Board was originally the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Employment. The transfer of its functions to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Wales took place in 1969 and it accompanied a transfer in funding arrangements for the board from the self-funding industry levy system to direct Government funding. That became necessary as the extremely disparate and remote nature of the industry, together with its preponderance of small businesses, made the business of levy collection somewhat difficult.

The current legislation governing the board's activities comprises the Agricultural Training Board Acts 1982 and 1985 and the Agricultural Training Board (Amendment) Order 1975. Under that legislation, the board is allowed to provide, approve and make recommendations on courses, test standards of training, give advice, and carry out research connected with employment in the agriculture industry pay maintenance and travelling expenses to trainees, pay grants or loans to course providers and to pay fees to providers of further education and make payments to employers for attendance of workers on those courses.

There is one all-embracing constraint in the current law. These functions may be exercised only in connection with training for those employed, or intending to be employed, within the commercial agriculture or horticulture industries in Britain or equivalent employment overseas. The board exercises these functions through its central committees and its unique system of training groups nationwide, together comprising a form of training co-operative for England, Wales and Scotland. If hon. Members have not seen the "Review of Training in Agriculture and Horticulture 1985-86" published by the board, they may find that helpful where they have problems over training in their constituents.

Each of the training groups consists of a number of local employers in agriculture and horticulture. They arrange their own training courses as required by their members, often on their own premises. This ensures that the courses that are provided have a much greater relevance to their area. Many groups employ their own group training organiser to co-ordinate the training activities, working in concert with a local agricultural college, a careers office and relevant institutions.

The board's local training officer makes the necessary arrangements for those groups which do not have their own resources. The board contributes directly to training through grants to the groups, and more directly by developing courses, course materials and training trainers. A great deal of course training material is available and this is sent out in booklet form to local groups. The students can take these booklets away with them after their on-farm training.

There are about 650 groups in Great Britain and every farmer and farm worker should be within reasonable travelling distance of a training group. In my county of Cornwall there are 10 training groups, and of these five employ a part-time group training organiser. In 1985-86 these Cornish groups held a total of 501 training course days. These included adult training and training for those on the board's apprenticeship scheme—the Agricultural and Horticultural Training Scheme—and for those on the youth training scheme in agriculture and horticulture in the county.

Why does the board need to broaden its scope of activity even more? The principal reason, as I stated at the outset, is that the demands upon, and the expectations of, agriculture are changing dramatically. There is a growing need for the relevant training courses to be made available to meet the new demands and expectations. When such a need becomes apparent it would be churlish to deny those who wish to acquire such training access to the board's undoubted expertise. There is a good precedent for allowing that access. As recently as 1985 the need for the board to extend its activities overseas was identified. This was principally to complement the United Kingdom's other export efforts in the agricultural sector, not just to export a new agricultural system, but to sell the training courses to foreign people. At the same time, that profitable enterprise helped to broaden the board's financial base, not only by reducing its reliance upon Government funding but by helping to reduce costs of courses and course materials to students in Great Britain.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): My hon. Friend served with me as a member of the Select Committee on Employment when we considered a number of training boards. Will my hon. Friend clarify the relationship between the Agricultural Training Board and other training boards? As I understand it, the other training boards come under the responsibility of the Department of Employment. I believe that the Agricultural Training Board is the only board that is dealt with separately. Is that so?

Mr. Neale: The Agricultural Training Board is the only board that receives direct funding from its sponsoring Ministry. However, it has representation across the country in a different form from that of any of the other boards, a number of which have now been abolished.

I want to consider the additional training needs that have been identified. Over the past few years the total Great Britain farm income as identified in the annual review of agriculture White Paper has fluctuated widely, but there is an underlying downward trend. This has been coupled with pressure on farmers to reduce production of a wide range of agricultural commodities that are in surplus. Particular measures in that area include the introduction—and subsequent cut—of milk quotas, the recently agreed package intended to reduce surplus beef production, and suggestions under discussion that some land should be diverted from cereal production. Farmers are therefore increasingly and often apprehensively having to look for ways other than the growing of traditional crops to maintain or increase their incomes. Many have considerable investment and loans involved in their land, buildings, stock and equipment which must be funded.

In addition, with the demand created by the increased leisure time available to the population generally, coupled with a growing awareness of the need to conserve, protect and enhance the environment, a greater need for training in these areas has developed rapidly. Some training is available from rural agencies such as the Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas, and the Countryside Commission. Other courses are provided by specialist training agencies such as the Forestry Training Council and by the agricultural colleges. However, the existing level of training is not sufficient to meet the ever-increasing needs of the agriculture and horticulture industries.

Manufacturing industry and commerce in Cornwall suffers from a comparatively uncompetitive location. Meanwhile, Cornwall's agriculture contributes about twice as much to the local gross product than is the case with the national economy. Agriculture in Cornwall is heavily dependent upon livestock, with dairying providing about 36 per cent. and other cattle about 25 per cent. of farming activity, much of which is carried out on small farms. It is evident that any measures intended to cut milk or beef production could have a more serious effect on the local economy than in other countries. Fortunately, we are blessed in the county with a mild climate and excellent scenery. This offers many opportunities for farmers to diversify their business, provided that they can acquire good quality training for themselves, their employees and their families.

Such diversification can take many forms. A major opportunity exists in the provision of tourist accommodation and other facilities. Indeed, a farm holiday group has already been established in Cornwall. Holiday makers are understandably keen to visit rural areas for recreation, and there are already a number of "model farms" in the county of Cornwall which attract significant number of visitors. Other opportunities exist to expand on that theme and to provide a whole range of activity holidays such as pony trekking, painting, photography or sport holidays in rural areas. Despite the poor weather in the county last year —it was a particularly freakish year in that respect—we are trying to use every means available to influence the weather in subsequent years to ensue that those who wish to come to Cornwall for a holiday are guaranteed a hospitable and enjoyable time. I am sure that many more farmers will be ready to accommodate people should they wish to take that kind of holiday.

Farmers or farm workers may also wish to exploit their own or their family's skills in particular crafts or in technical areas. One particular craft that springs to mind in relation to Cornwall is the manufacture of surf boards. Surfing has become a very popular sport in the west country. Many farmers have redundant barns which can be used for the production of such equipment. This craft is typical of the latent artisic and technical skills that can be trained and directed to profitable effect.

The operation of services such as farm shops, taxis and village bus services may also be commercially more viable when operated in conjunction with existing agricultural businesses. Finally, we should not forget the on-farming processing if the products of farming itself. The obvious examples are cream, cheese and Cornish pasties. Some on-farm businesses have shown remarkable growth in those areas recently, in Cornwall and elsewhere.

In addition to specific training in the operation of all those activities as part of a business, we should not ignore the importance of training in marketing techniques. It is of little value to have an excellent product if it cannot be sold, and the board is mindful of that.

My Bill does not merely extend the board's scope to train those involved in farming in new activities. It will also permit the board to offer training in what I have termed "amenity activities" to those outside commercial agriculture and horticulture. Training should be available in skills relating to the care of land or animals, with sport, recreation and conservation in mind. Once again some training is available in those areas, but not enough. The Agriculture Training Board, with its highly regarded training methods, its knowledge of and relationship with the farming industry, and its expertise in land-related skills, is ideally placed to meet those various needs.

The Bill is a short one with only two clauses. The objective of clause 1(1) is principally to insert into section 4 of the Agricultural Training Board Act 1982 enabling powers for the board to undertake training activities in addition to those that are already permitted. The new activities are defined in new section 5A. To avoid unnecessary duplication of courses and facilities with other public and private sector agencies the addition to new section 4 requires the board to have regard to any courses or facilities otherwise available for the purpose before providing training in additional activities.

Clause 1(2) inserts new section 5A into the 1982 Act and specifies the additional training activities which may be undertaken. As section 5(1A) of the Agricultural Training Board Act 1985 is unamended, the board may not undertake these new activities outside Great Britain.

New section 5A(1)(a) specifies those who may be trained by the board in diversification activities. The section refers to training in "activities not comprised within the industry."

That means the industry as defined in the 1975 order. Broadly speaking, then, the section is referring to non-agricultural skills of the type that I have mentioned.

Paragraphs (i) and (ii) of new section 5A(1)(a) define more closely the groups of people involved. Paragraph (i) refers to those employed in the industry. That does not mean merely employees, but employers and the self-employed; in other words, all who are actively engaged in a commercial agricultural or horticultural business. Paragraph (ii) refers to members of the families of people so employed. This is to avoid the position where a farmer or worker may be trained by the board, for example in the provision of tourist facilities, but a spouse, not strictly being employed in the industry, may not receive such training.

New section 5A(1)(b) introduces the other new area of activities which the board may undertake, namely, training in amenity skills of persons not currently employed in the industry. New section 5A(2) defines amenity skills for the purposes of new section 5A(1)(b). For ease of reference the definition falls into two parts. The first, new section 5A(2)(a), refers to skills directly connected to the land. There are three general areas of land use identified—sporting, recreational and environmental. I intend that the phrase, of such land should be all-embracing and cover all the activities which would need to be undertaken to make and maintain land fit for the purposes described.

"development, improvement, conservation or maintenance"

The second part, new section 5A(2)(b), refers to skills connected with the rearing or care, but excluding the training, of animals for sporting, recreational or environmental purposes. I recognise that the board, with its expertise in land-related skills, has much to offer in the training of people who keep or rear animals. This will include animals which may need to be protected or encouraged in the wild, and sport birds and fish, from which there may be associated benefits in conservation through the care of habitat.

New section 5A(3) obliges the board to consult the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food together with the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales before providing new categories of courses or facilities.

New section 5A(4) imposes a duty on the board to conduct its affairs in such a way that revenue received from its new functions under section (4)(1)(bb) will at the earliest possible date at least meet the expediture incurred in the exercise of those functions, thereby ensuring that the board suffers no financial losses and that the activities are not funded by Government grants. This will make it fully competitive with other agencies which offer such training. This requirement is identical to that already accepted in 1985 by the House, which covers the board's overseas commercial activities.

It is intended that the board's new activities should not be a charge on Exchequer aid; rather, that by acting commerially the board may show some profit. If it should transpire that diversification and amenity skills activities do not prove to be self-financing, section 6 of the 1982 Act empowers Ministers to direct that the operation of such activities shall cease. Meanwhile, any pump-priming moneys required to finance these new activities must be found from income from existing commerical activities, rather than from grant-aid.

[Mr. Neale]

Clause 1(3) extends the Minister's powers under section 7 of the 1982 Act to disclose information to the board which will assist it in carrying out its new functions. Information already supplied under section 7 could be relevant to its new functions, and this clause merely expands the section in line with the board's new powers.

Clause 1(4) inserts a new paragraph, paragraph (aa), into section 8(1A) of the 1982 Act, as amended by the 1985 Act. Section 8(1) requires the board to keep proper accounts and records and to prepare a yearly statement of account in the form determined by Ministers and the Treasury. The 1985 Act amplified the section of the 1982 Act requiring the board to keep separate records and accounts for its commercial overseas activities. New paragraph (aa) requires that a similar separate account should be kept, covering the new functions described in section 4(1)(bb).

Although the Bill will expand the ATB, such expansion can only be for the overall good of the agriculture industry and, indeed, for the amenity and leisure industries. Not only will farmers and amenity workers who wish to learn a new skill benefit from receiving expert tuition in what is potentially a wide range of subjects, but basic agricultural skills training will benefit from the reinvestment by the board of additional income derived from these new sources. The record of the ATB in agricultural training shows that the board warrants not only continuing, but further, support in the direction outlined in the Bill, and I commend the measure to the House.

9.58 am

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): I wish to make a short speech in support of the Bill as I am one of its sponsors. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale) on his important initiative in bringing the measure before the House. It is important in terms of extending and diversifying acquired skills in rural areas and equipping agriculture to adapt to the changing circumstances of the future. That was perhaps the most important point made by the hon. Gentleman. Agriculture must face future changes in circumstances and it is essential that people involved in agriculture are trained to meet the new challenges. I hazard a prediction that when this short Bill reaches the statute book it will have more far-reaching significance than a good many other measures that have had a higher political profile in the House.

I have two purposes in giving the Bill my support. First, I agree wholeheartedly with what it tries to do in principle. Secondly—here I shall make a regional point—in the medium and long term there will be substantial opportunities through which the rural and industrial economies of East Anglia can benefit. East Anglia is predominantly an arable farming area. The long-term view for arable farming, in a much wider context than East Anglia, is that we simply cannot go on piling up arable surpluses without making some attempt to reduce structural excesses to a manageable proportion. In doing that, there must be a ground change whereby agriculture can adapt to new opportunities and provide new employment prospects.

The Bill seeks to amend the scope of activities of the ATB. Like any other organisation, it must operate under working definitions of what it can and cannot do. The Bill seeks to widen the terms of reference of the ATB and allow it to do more in areas such as recreation and the environment. Those two aspects are interconnected. The training activities that currently exist outside the remit of the ATB's agenda clearly should be part of the ATB's future responsibilities. If agriculture and rural areas are to adapt to future changes in circumstances, there must be a change in the ATB's training agenda.

The hon. Member for Cornwall, North clearly explained the purposes of the Bill and he outlined what the clauses seek to do. I shall refer to two areas mentioned in suggested new section 5A(1)(a), which states:

"with a view to the diversification of the trades or businesses carried on by persons so employed".

The important word is "diversification". There must be diversification in the process of adaptation and aiming towards doing new things in rural areas. Proposed new section 5A(2)(a) refers to "the development, improvement, conservation or maintenance of land for sporting, recreational or environmental purposes."

Those two aspects are important as they provide a way out of some of the pressing problems in agricultural employment and activity in rural areas.

The work of the ATB in Suffolk has been a success story, despite existing limitations, and I pay tribute to those who, over the years, have made this enterprise such a working success. It works through training groups and it has a training officer. Its training is conducted through both apprentice-type courses and regular participation in the YTS scheme. It has adapted to local circumstances. The training that it offers occurs on farms and in an agricultural college, and one group in Earl Soham has its own training centre. There are eight groups, five in agriculture proper and three in horticulture, and they have been a success on two counts. First, they have equipped young people with marketable skills and, secondly, they have meant that East Anglia is well to the front in agricultural quality.

East Anglia agriculture owes a debt to the board's training. The courses are diverse and by no means tied to the predominantly arable nature of the region. With the increased use of sophisticated machinery and the responsibility entailed by the increased use of chemicals and pesticides, some courses have a high-tech approach.

East Anglia supports the change in the Bill for very relevant reasons, because it wants to look to the future. First, farming in this country is in an age of surplus and the aims of public policy must change accordingly. Structural arable farming surpluses can no longer be financed on the scale on which they have been financed in the past. We cannot, as an aim of public policy, produce food on the scale that we did in times gone by. In the past, ever-increasing production and productivity were fundamental aims that overrode other matters, but that is no longer the case. There is a need to diversify and to look to other activities to ensure employment in rural economies. If this is to be achieved, training must be put on a wider and more flexible basis. For this reason, the changes highlighted in the Bill are not only desirable but essential.

We no longer need an agricultural policy—we need farm and countryside policies that are interdependent and can benefit from each other. In the post-war period in East Anglia, tens of thousands of people left the land, many of them young persons. If there are to be new opportunities for activity and if the ATB is to widen and build on the success of its past performance to include the new scenario, we in East Anglia stand a chance of halting and reversing the decline.

I wish the Bill well. It is based on need and is a welcome and thoughtful step towards improving the economy of the countryside.

Sir Peter Mills (Torridge and Devon, West): I am grateful for this opportunity to support my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale). This is a good Bill and will be of great benefit to the south-west and many other areas. I congratulate my hon. Friend on bringing it forward. It also gives me much pleasure to support my hon. Friend, after the support that he gave me on the Okehampton bypass issue, particularly when I could not be in the House because I was ill. My hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, South-East (Mr. Hicks) has asked me to say that he fully supports the Bill and regrets that he has to be in his constituency today.

There is no doubt that the Bill is needed. Great changes have taken place in agriculture over the years. Having been involved in agriculture since I was a boy of 14, I have seen the enormous problems that have arisen because of the changing scene. The changes have caused considerable sacrifices to be made by rural people—sacrifices, as my hon. Friend said, including loss of employment, with all that that means.

We must face the fact that the demand for food has dropped—last year, a staggering 18 per cent. less butter was consumed—but production has been encouraged to increase dramatically. When I was a very young man, we thought that it was good if we produced 25 cwt of cereals to the acre. Now it has all changed. Modern machinery has meant that vast numbers of men are not required. Huge surpluses, because agriculture has been too successful, have resulted in cuts and quotas. This has meant a considerable drop in income and a decline in the economic life of rural areas affecting everyone—not only farmers but farm workers, machinery manufacturers and all those who service this great industry. We cannot be blind to those facts.

The worst sin of all is for some Opposition parties—I exempt the Socialist party—to say that there is no need for these cuts. I regret the fact that the Social Democrats and Liberals still carry on in their speeches in the south-west as though there were no problems. A letter which I received from the chairman of the economic and employment committee of Devon county council, Councillor Walker, an ardent Liberal, was written as though nothing had happened and he and others could continue misleading farmers into thinking that the status quo should continue. That is not true. It is unfair. There must be changes and cuts.

Mr. Thurnham: Is my hon. Friend aware of the recent remarks by the president of the National Farmers Union, Mr. Simon Gourlay, when referring to a speech by the leader of the SDP? He said:

"You will annihilate UK farming. You do not begin to comprehend what you are suggesting".

The average size of a farm in Britain is so much greater than the average size of a farm in Europe that any policies that might be beneficial to small farmers in Europe will be ruinous in this country.

Sir Peter Mills: I am well aware of that. One of the distressing problems in the political scene is that the policies of the Liberals and Social Democrats vary from constituency to constituency. It is sad that misleading statements are made. We must reduce agricultural production and find alternative ways of assisting farm workers and farmers. The Bill will do that.

We need to plan for a "revival"—a term that I like—of rural activity, and the Bill will assist. Activities must be encouraged to make up for the loss of production in normal farming. The Agricultural Training Board needs to have its powers and functions widened to offer training outside the scope of the industry to allow farmers to be trainined to take up other activities and to diversify their businesses. I do not think that anyone would argue against that view. Everyone should support the Bill.

I believe that this Government will support the extension of training to achieve a rural revival. Other measures are needed. It is no good men and women being trained in new skills if they are not allowed to set up businesses to use those new skills. There are currently too many central and local government planning restrictions and other, probably unnecessary, bureaucratic controls which stultify and frequently totally prevent farmers from diversifying and developing new and constructive uses for their land and buildings, not necessarily totally oriented towards traditional farming.

Probably the biggest problem is the heavy-handed planning restriction. No one wants this to be totally removed, so as to allow pre-war ribbon development and other uses that might be adverse to the rural environment, but there needs to be a more common-sense approach to opportunities for new businesses to be developed in the countryside. Only if such development occurs will employment be maintained or increased in rural areas while employment in traditional agriculture inevitably drops.

If the skills of farmers, farm workers and their families are to be widened and other enterprises set up, planning permission must be given.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food (Mr. Donald Thompson) indicated assent.

Sir Peter Mills: I am glad that my hon. Friend is nodding his head. I hope that the instructions to the planning committees of the various councils will be tougher and stronger, so that that becomes a reality.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my hon. Friend take account of the fact that, in park areas such as the Lake District, where I live, planning permission is required to be given by not only the South Lakeland district council but the special planning board, which leads to more difficulties?

Sir Peter Mills: I have similar problems with the national parks planning committee in Dartmoor. That is an important point. Local planning authorities should listen and act on Government advice to allow more small businesses to start up in rural areas. Germany has a good system of small factories where some members of a farmer's family can work while continuing to maintain the farm. We must develop that system in this country.

Redundant farm workers need the chance of work in their villages, but that will never happen if planning restrictions mean that small businesses are not allowed to start. I know of a disused Methodist chapel outside a village in North Devon. The planning authorities caused endless trouble to the two people who were trying to use the chapel as a small factory. The authorities demanded double glazing, sound proofing and goodness knows what else. Such petty conditions hinder people in starting businesses. There is no doubt that many disused barns and other buildings in the countryside could be used for these purposes.

Training skills are needed, and the Bill will assist in providing them. We need a balance in rural society again. Work in the form of rural crafts, light industry and farming will be of benefit, if we can get the combination right to the rural revival and the rural environment about which I am so keen.

The south-west faces a problem because the fastest growing group in the south-west are retired people. I beg retired people to remember that people have to work. As I have said before, we cannot all live on fresh air and a view. Some of us have to find employment. There must be readjustment in rural life, because traditional ways cannot go on. A big change must take place.

There are restrictions other than planning. Farmers and their staff, because they live in the countryside, are still those most concerned with the conservation of the environment and the health of their animals. Unhappy, uncared-for stock do not grow and are not profitable. Extreme views on animal liberation, conservation of the environment, diet and health must not be allowed to take over the in the interests of short-term political expediency, often fuelled through substantial ignorance. The rural community needs to be assured that the urban politicians will not be too easily be swayed into making the farmers' already difficult financial position unnecessarily impossible.

Many other factors besides just training are involved if we are to achieve this rural revival that is so important for our areas, especially the south-west. Such factors are training, planning and allowing the farmer and the farm workers to get on with the skills and the jobs that they know so well.

I give a fair wind to this Bill. It will help effect the changes that must take place because of surplus production. If those measures are carried out, the rural scene will be revived.

Mrs. Elizabeth Shields (Ryedale): We in the alliance support the Bill. The legislation contained in it aims chiefly to assist the farming industry to diversify its activities. Diversification, whether into tourism, crafts or similar ancillary activities, offers an important opportunity to strengthen agriculture, but the Government's wish to be seen to be promoting the Bill arguably emphasises its sensitivity to the current malaise of British farming.

Before discussing the details of the Bill, it is perhaps appropriate to reflect for a moment on the need for that diversification. The slump in farm incomes, recorded at 43 per cent. in the 1986 annual White Paper, with not too great a recovery expected in the imminent review, the high levels of indebtedness, damagingly high interest rates and uncertainty about production practices and future prospects are symptomatic of a general failure by the Government to supply a lead to the industry.

The Bill, essentially an employment measure, is being introduced at a time when the number of jobs in agriculture, fisheries and forestry has fallen by more than one sixth since 1979. The immediate prospects are no less stark. Last week's Public Expenditure White Paper referred only to a "partial and modest recovery." The reasons are not hard to discern. Support for structural measures alone, which are particularly important in the hills and uplands — I have some of those in my constituency — is forecast to fall to £256 million in 1986-87 against £302 million last year, spending in that area alone has fallen by more than one third since 1983. So the welcome for this Bill is tempered by the recognition of the deep and continuing decline in agriculture that has taken place in recent years.

I shall comment briefly on some of the remarks made by Conservative Members. The alliance agricultural policies are directed to the preservation of the small farmers, but in recent years the policies of the dairy quotas, the co-responsibility levy on cereals and the variable beef premium have all added to the problems associated with people who have perhaps only 50, 60 or 70 acres. Those who have a large acreage — 2,000 acres — will lose on profits; the livelihoods of the smaller farmers are at risk.

As the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) said, we cannot live on fresh air, and neither can small farmers. At present Government policies are forcing more and more small farms out of business. Perhaps the Government should take note of the many bankruptcies that have occurred as a result of their policies.

The Bill proposes two changes to the current operation of the Agricultural Training Board. First, it allows the board to provide training for those employed in agriculture and their families through "the diversification of agricultural businesses".

Secondly, it allows the board to offer

"training in amenity skills of persons who are not employed in the industry".

The need for the first dispensation arises from the Government's growing interest in diversification as a means of alleviating these problems of the industry.

Even though belated and modest, the Government's response to the case made by the alliance, not least at the time of the Second Reading of the Agricultural Bill in November 1985, for a change in direction in agriculture is welcome. Successful diversification could ultimately help to stop the outflow from farming to other employment —though only of course where that is available—as well as to maintain existing jobs in rural areas.

Diversification, which includes the judicious promotion of tourism, is certainly welcome. The maintenance and, in some cases, the revival of ancient handicrafts could bring interest and employment to our rural areas, not least to many in my own constituency where our Ryedale Quest will again encourage visitors to explore the delightful villages of north Yorkshire and thereby help to keep them alive.

It may also be argued that the Bill is a logical step in the progressive development of the ATB which has taken place since its foundation in 1966. Since that time, the board has developed from simply providing training for agricultural employees in agricultural techniques, and currently enjoys considerable support in the industry. The ATB's new responsibilities will have an important role to play, if only to restrain producers from trying to go into unsuitable enterprises or to diversify without the appropriate skills. These duties have therefore been welcomed by the National Farmers Union and the Tenant Farmers Association. It seems sensible for the board to provide training in, for example, farm machinery maintenance for those who, although not employed in agriculture, nevetheless work with tractors, combines and other equipment.

In addition, the increasingly technical nature of modern farming results in a growing need for training and retraining to acquire new skills. Boys and girls can no longer go into farming on leaving school by simply staying on a farm. They need training in various and many agricultural techniques.

There is general agreement that the quality of training provided by the ATB is high, and that it should be more widely available than at present. Therefore, I believe that the Bill is a useful measure but it does not relieve the Government from their central task of providing consistent, considered and strategic advice to the industry. The future health of our rural economy depends upon the adoption of such an approach.

10.27 am

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I shall refer briefly to the speech of the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mrs. Shields). She said that she was going to speak on alliance policies. What causes Conservative Members the greatest concern is that there are so many policies that it is difficult to determine exactly what policy the alliance is trying to put forward. No doubt if an attempt is made shortly to re-launch the various Opposition parties we shall hear more about a single policy rather than about policies. The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) has now entered the Chamber, so no doubt we shall hear a little more about some of the additional policies that the alliance is putting forward.

Mrs. Shields: I assure the hon. Gentleman and all Members in the Chamber that the alliance will have one policy and that it will come out next week. It is a question, not of may be, but of will be. There will be one unified policy. Anything that applied when the two parties came together will be made one. It will be seen as one unified policy.

Mr. Thurnham: That will have to be prepared at great speed, because the hon. Lady referred to policies. Presumably much work will have to be done in the next few days to bring everything together into one single policy. We shall look forward to that with the greatest interest.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale) on his good fortune in winning such a high place in the ballot. Hon. Members are always interested to know the result of the ballot and the place that they have secured. I remember listening with great interest to the announcement of the ballot results in a Committee Room. The higher one's place in the ballot, the greater one's chances of success. Having secured a high place in the ballot, however, it is most important to introduce a Bill that will gain wide acceptance on both sides of the House. I am sure that my hon. Friend will be successful in securing that acceptance. I assure him that he will have my support in his efforts to place the Bill on the statute book.

I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) is about to leave the Chamber. I note that his Bill is listed on the Order Paper, and it is to be hoped that time will be available to debate it. He might be interested to know that production of agricultural products has increased so enormously because of improvement in livestock production. Embryo research has led to considerable improvements in livestocks, and those who are engaged in agriculture will know that this has been an important factor. Developments and improvements in agriculture in Australia, for example, have led to that country being in the forefront of human reproduction studies. The world's second test tube baby was born in Australia.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. It is difficult to relate test tube babies to agricultural training.

Mr. Thurnham: I am anxious, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that we should retain the interest of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North. I should hate him to miss some of the issues that will arise in this debate that might be of interest to him at a later stage today.

As I have said, it is important to introduce a Bill that is acceptable to both sides of the House. I remember that last year my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam), although lowly placed in the ballot, was able to bring forward an excellent Bill dealing with corneal grafting. I think that his position in the ballot was No. 14, but his Bill gained rapid acceptance on both sides of the House and found its way quickly on to the statute book. I commend to hon. Members the idea that they should introduce Bills that gain wide acceptance on both sides of the House.

It is a pleasure to speak in the Chamber on a Friday when the atmosphere is conducive to a good debate, and I hope that we shall have a good debate today. I remember that when I first spoke in the House on a Friday I had only recently completed some calculations that showed that the cost of running the House was £10,000, or perhaps £20,000, an hour. I think that we should all be conscious of the length of time that we speak and ensure that we take the greatest advantage of that time. Fridays give us the opportunity, however, to have a constructive debate that can be of interest to Hon. Members of both sides of the House and to those outside who are concerned with the subjects that we discuss.

I served as a member of the Select Committee on Employment with my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North, and before this debate we discussed the fact that the Agricultural Training Board is not within the province of the Department of Employment. It is unique in coming within the direct sponsorship of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. In the same way, the wages council for agriculture is not within the province of the Department of Employment. Thus, the Agricultural Training Board has slightly greater scope in the way in which it can relate to industry. This is possible as it does not have to meet the bureaucratic requirements that other training boards may feel they must comply with if they are to work in harmony with the relevant industries. We shall have to consider whether the activities of the Agricultural Training Board will conflict with those of other boards. It is important that the taxpayer is not involved in funding over provision.

Before speaking in detail on the Bill, I must declare a personal interest. I am a small-scale farmer in Cumbria, with rather more than 200 acres. Most of the land is tenanted, but part of it is freehold. My wife and I are engaged in agriculture and we are concerned with broader aspects of farming, including the use of older buildings. There is a listed building on our farmland. It is a Pele tower, which is unique to our part of the country. It is a listed grade II building, and the use of such buildings and the wider interest that the public display in our heritage are factors which the board should take into account when widening the provisions and scope of the training that is being offered.

I was pleased to see my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in his place for the early part of the debate. My farm is in his constituency and he knows of my personal interest in the subject.

Both my own family and my wife's have long connections with farming. My father was a tea planter throughout his working life. He planted originally in south India and then worked for Brooke Bond, being responsible for its tea estates worldwide. One of the better provisions of the Bill is that it gives the board scope to gain income from abroad by charging fees for the training that it can provide for those overseas who wish to learn about the great advances that have been made in agriculture in the United Kingdom.

My mother's family was engaged in market gardening for many generations, and my wife's family, too, has been active in farming. My wife has three brothers and they are all farmers. I am a refrigeration engineer and my business involves the provision of cold stores to keep food refrigerated. I am worried about the extent of United Kingdom food surpluses. There are 2 million tonnes of butter and beef in cold storage and this is costing a great deal. One of the effects of this is a distortion of the cold storage industry. I understand that it is costing £1 million a day to store the surpluses. We cannot tolerate any growth of the surpluses and we must seek ways of reducing them.

Anyone who is concerned with rural life must understand the need for diversification. It is important that farmers have other sources of income, and that has always been possible in traditional tourist areas. We must consider every form of income that can be brought into the farming community, so that there is less reliance on products that are in surplus. This must be to the benefit of farmers, who will have a broader source of income. Another beneficiary will be the taxpayer, who cannot continue funding products that are in surplus.

I well remember my first meeting with my wife's family, who farm just outside Cambridge. I became involved in a lively discussion about subsidies. I found myself in considerable trouble when I suggested that it would be expensive to pay for parkkeepers to keep the countryside tidy. To say that to a family of hardworking farmers who had acquired additional farms so that all three sons could go into farming meant that my courtship started rather stickily on that day. I think that all those who are involved in agriculture will accept, however, that we cannot continue producing commodities that are in surplus. It is necessary to take a much broader view.

I am surprised that my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North has not proposed that we should rename the Agricultural Training Board the Rural Training Board. The thrust of his speech was that we must address ourselves to the rural community. Consequently, it might be simpler and more straightforward if we regarded the board as a rural training board.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian) indicated assent.

Mr. Thurnham: I note that the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) agrees with me. That is interesting, as the hon. Gentleman is one of the Opposition's spokesman on agriculture and is sitting on the Opposition Front Bench. I think I am right in saying that I read today's newspaper yesterday. Sometimes I am confused about which day's newspaper I have read, especially when I read the day's newspaper the previous night because I have received an early edition of it, with the result that I cannot remember when referring to a newspaper article whether it was in the day's newspaper or in the edition that appeared on the previous day and found that it contained an article stating that the Labour party would launch a discussion document today.

Mr. Home Robertson: No, that was yesterday.

Mr. Thurnham: It appears that the Labour party proposes to have a Department of Rural Affairs, which would no doubt have greater scope than the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. It is possible that the hon. Member for East Lothian will propose that the board should be renamed the Rural Training Board. We might be able to discuss that issue on another occasion.

It is excellent that there should be more self-funding provision. One of the best features of the Bill is that it does not call for additional public funding. My hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North is looking for direct funding by the beneficiaries of the training themselves. If the Agricultural Training Board is to stand on its own feet and charge for its services, does my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) consider that it could be privatised? Presumably not every agricultural activity has to be funded by the state. If we live in a market economy, I believe that the more agricultural provisions that can be provided on a market basis the better. My hon. Friend should consider that.

Mr. Neale: My hon. Friend may not be aware that the Government have pegged the amount of funding for the board for some while. The board is looking increasingly for outside funding of its courses. I am sure Labour Members feel that because people had to pay for courses this can endanger the courses that are offered. However, on the contrary, the board has found that people are willing to pay for courses, if they are good, and therefore the board has become more market orientated. However, it would be a dangerous course to remove all Government funding. The Government must retain an interest, to ensure that the board continues.

Mr. Thurnham: I thank my hon. Friend for making that point. My hon. Friend may think that it is dangerous to remove all Government funding, but it is also dangerous to become too dependent upon that funding. Nothing could be better than for any organisation to be fully funded by the market that it serves. By doing so, it escapes the fate that has befallen so many training boards.

I believe that in 1981, 16 of the then 23 training boards that came under the scope of the Department of Employment were abolished. That fate could befall the Agricultural Training Board if another party came into power and financial stringencies were imposed. My hon. Friends will recall that in 1977 the International Monetary Fund had to bail the country out. It may be that at a future date the training board, funded by Government will be abolished. Therefore, the more funds the Agricultural Training Board can obtain from elsewhere, the better.

Sir Peter Mills: May I remind my hon. Friend and the House that, besides the Agricultural Training Board, the young farmers clubs run excellent courses in proficiency and so on, for which the members pay themselves. That could be encouraged and certainly in my role as chairman of the Conservative Back Bench agriculture committee I would suggest to the young farmers clubs that they move out and organise courses not only for agricultural training, but for other training, to take account of the changes that are taking place.

Mr. Thurnham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Perhaps the members of the Agricultural Training Board who are taking an interest in today's debate—I hope that they are—will consider in a future annual report extending the scope of training and acknowledging the contributions made by other people. The latest report that I have, that for 1985-86, shows that the Government funding in that year was £7·74 million, which accounted for 84·6 per cent. of total funding.

The big change has been the amount of money coming in from the Manpower Services Commission through the youth training service. The Agricultural Training Board should change the balance of its funding and seek other sources that will strengthen it and make it less liable to difficulties in the future.

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): Is my hon. Friend aware that Government funding is taken from the agricultural support market for the industry and therefore the funding comes from the agriculture industry?

Mr. Thurnham: The total cost of the agriculture industry to the taxpayer is £2 billion. I am sure the taxpayer hopes that, over the course of time, if farming continues to be as productive as it is, agriculture will be less rather than more dependent on the taxpayer. I hope that the board will extend its sources of income by widening the scope of its activities as set out in this excellent Bill.

The Bill is not in the business of making a levy. Only last week we debated the Construction Industry Training Board and there was a proposal to increase the payroll levy from 1 to 2 per cent. for certain classes of contracted-out labour. When the Agricultural Training Board was set up it was found that it was not possible for the board to raise its funds through a levy because of the nature of the industry. Of course, farmers are always reluctant to part with any money, and that would have been necessary if a levy had been imposed. I sincerely hope that there will be an opportunity to increase outside funding, because that must be to the advantage of the board and its future operations.

I welcome the widened scope of services offered. We certainly need more training and to remove restrictions on the type of training. I am surprised that in the Bill there are restrictions on the type of training to be provided. There is the strange anomaly of the exclusion of the training of animals. I do not understand why such training has been specifically excluded.

A near neighbour in Cumbria recently applied for planning permission for an indoor riding centre. Unfortunately, permission was refused. This is one of the difficulties faced by farmers. Show jumping would have been an integral part of that centre. I do not understand why we should exclude the training of show jumpers, in which this country leads the world, from the rural activities that we are trying to encourage.

When the Bill is in Committee, as I am sure it will be shortly, I hope that my hon. Friend will reconsider that provision most carefully. There should be fewer restrictions. I read somewhere that there is anxiety that the Agricultural Training Board will, in some ways, turn itself into a racehorse training board. What is wrong with the training of racehorses if it is an activity that can contribute to the life of the countryside? Such training provides an enormous levy for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, which in turn helps to pay for the agricultural subsidies. I do not understand why there is any restriction at all on the training provided.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I hope it will be made clear in Committee that the Bill restricts the training of people to train animals.

Mr. Thurnham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for pointing out that it does not go as far as I feared.

I am sure that the general intentions of the Bill will be welcomed by town and country dwellers alike. We are not merely proposing greater training for those who live in the country. It is the ambition of many town dwellers to get a job in the country. If we widen the scope of jobs that are available in the country, that must be to the advantage of town dwellers. I welcome the provisions in the Bill to provide training for those who are already involved in agriculture, and also for those who are outside the agriculture industry at present. If the board is funded by the taxpayer in the future, as it has been in the past, it is important that all the people who contribute to the funding of the board should benefit from its widened scope.

For farm workers, anything that reduces their reliance upon the strict specialisation that operated in the past must be an advantage. It is a tragedy that the restrictions that applied to the Agricultural Traning Board in the past resulted in people being trained so narrowly that all they could do was to contribute to the surplus of labour that was already presenting a problem to the industry. I hope that in future that will be less of a difficulty.

The west country has always been a favourite area for tourists. My favourite product from Cornwall must be clotted cream, for which it is renowned. There is little to rival the quality of farmhouse cream teas in Cornwall. I have always thought that Cornish farmers were in no way behind the times in their knowledge of how to market a fine product. Marketing will, no doubt, be one of the disciplines that can be taught by the Agricultural Training Board in future under these wider provisions. I am sure that those who are concerned with the industry in Cornwall will be able to teach others quite a lot about marketing. They are not behind the times in knowing how to market their services there.

I am a member of the council of the Cumbria tourist board. When remarks are made that are damaging to the tourist industry, they cause enormous concern. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North is not suffering in his constituency from the trouble that we have experienced in Cumbria. The would-be Member for Knowsley, North, Mr. Huckfield, made the most damaging remarks about the tourist industry in Cumbria, and they have led to great setbacks and difficulties. It is important that in its widened scope the Agricultural Training Board should be able to educate all members of the public who are in a position to influence opinion that they should not make remarks that are as damaging to the tourist industry in Cumbria as Mr. Huckfield's remarks have been. He spoke about the effect of the nuclear industry on Cumbria, and his remarks have led to reductions in employment in Cumbria's tourist industry.

I support all the provisions of the Bill. They will enhance tourism, for which there is great scope. Farm buildings have traditionally been a good place for a holiday. I hope that the Agricultural Training Board will be able to work closely with other training boards that are involved in the tourist industry. I do not know whether my hon. Friend has been able to consider the relationship between the ATB and the Hotel and Catering Training Board. The two must overlap to a great extent. As provision is being made for farmers to learn other skills, the provision of farmhouse accommodation will bring farmers into the hotel and catering industry. I do not know whether my hon. Friend has been able to consider whether there should be joint provision of training by the two training boards.

Mr. Neale: It is not the intention—indeed, it is not possible under the Bill—for the Agricultural Training Board to enter into the substantial duplication of existing courses. The intention of the Bill is that by encouraging those who are involved in farming to diversify, the board should find out how best it can fill the gaps in training that need to be filled if the industry is to take advantage of the new opportunities.

Mr. Thurnham I am glad that my hon. Friend has been able to consider the point. If the board is able to fill gaps in the existing provision of training, that can only be welcomed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West referred to the difficulties caused by planning restrictions. If we are to expand the rural economy from its traditional activities in the past to new activities in the future, planning will be one of the most sensitive and difficult areas. I hope that the Government's great interest in reducing the burdens on industry, and also in deregulation, will lead to it becoming easier for the countryside to be used in a broader sense for the enjoyment of all, instead of restrictions being imposed because of a narrow view of what should or should not be done.

Whether or not there should be more housing development in the countryside is a sensitive area that will have to be considered with great care by local planning boards. However, I hope that new industries will be looked at in openminded and constructive ways by the planning boards, so that training can be provided in new occupations as they arise. It is impossible to know what new industries will develop that are suitable for the countryside, but it is important that planning restrictions should not throttle and stifle new developments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North referred to training boards in particular parts of the country. The Lancashire agricultural training board is the training board that is of the greatest significance to my constituents. I am glad to say that we have more training groups in Lancashire than my hon. Friend has in his county of Cornwall. I understand that there are 12 different groups in the county, managed by local farmers. I imagine that those groups are managed in much the same way as they are managed in Cornwall. In the current 12-month period, 350 course days will have been held. Over 300 youngsters have benefited through the new training scheme from training in the industry.

I am a little concerned that the Lancashire agricultural training board's activities should still be very much related to the provision of agricultural skills. I understand that, in special training, emphasis has been placed upon beef production, soft cheese making and yoghurt making. The training has been aimed at dairy farmers, but we must find a way of extending the scope for training people who have depended upon farming in the past for their livelihood. We must encourage a move away from the traditional industries. Cheese making and yoghurt making should be encouraged, but we must look much more widely than that. I hope that the Lancashire ATB, under the excellent chairmanship of Mr. Talbot, will be able to widen the scope of its activities.

I am conscious of the time and am aware that other hon. Members wish to speak in this debate. Therefore, I end by congratulating once more my hon. Friend on introducing a Bill that will extend the scope and activities of this industry. I hope that the bill will be welcomed as it continues on its way through both this House and the other place. I shall give it my greatest support.

10.56 am

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): The hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) prefaced his remarks by saying that he wanted to have a constructive debate on the subject of the Agricultural Training Board Bill, and he went on to give us a blow-by-blow account of his courtship of a farmer's daughter in Cambridgeshire. Anyone who makes the mistake of reading this debate, or any members of the public who are making the mistake of listening to it, must wonder what on earth is going on. At the beginning of his speech, the hon. Gentleman made it abundantly clear that what he was really doing was taking up time in order to prevent the Unborn Children (Protection) Bill, which is third on the Order Paper today, from being reached and debated.

Mr. Thurnham: I hope that I made it clear that, being involved in farming myself and with my wife being the owner of over 200 acres of land, I have a very great interest in the Bill. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not suggesting in any way that my contribution to this debate was on anything other than a proper and genuine basis.

Mr. Home Robertson: Of course the hon. Gentleman's speech was entirely in order; otherwise you, Mr. Speaker, or Mr. Deputy Speaker, would have stopped him in his tracks. However, I am amazed that he managed to make that intervention with a straight face.

We have had an interesting debate so far, which I understand will be interrupted in about three minutes by the Leader of the House. Perhaps, therefore, I may tread water for a minute or two as well and then try to take up the thread of the debate a little later.

The hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) referred to his deep commitment, and that of his party, to the rural revival. He could have fooled me, in view of the conduct of this Government and this particular Minister of Agriculture towards the rural areas of Britain throughout the seven years of this Administration. It is worth noting that, although the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West is committed so deeply to the rural revival, the Government that he supports have published no White Paper on rural policy. They have staggered from one crisis to another and farming is in dire difficulties.

We do not know what is the Government's policy, any more than we are yet familiar with the policy of the alliance, although I am delighted to see that the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) has seen fit to come and take part in the debate. He made an interesting speech recently on the subject of agriculture, in which he suggested a policy which at a stroke, would increase European Community funded support to all farmers in all countries on the mainland of Europe, while cutting the support to farmers in Britain.

I understand from the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mrs. Shields) that the alliance intends to publish a document on agricultural policy in the next week or two. We shall be fascinated to see what it says and whether it includes the sort of ideas that were being suggested by the right hon. Member for, Devonport during his recent lecture that he delivered recently.

It being Eleven o'clock, MR. SPEAKER interrupted proceedings, pursuant to Standing Order No. 5 (Friday sittings).

Business of the House

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short statement about changes in the business announced for next week.

In the light of your ruling yesterday, Mr. Speaker, and following discussions through the usual channels, the business for Tuesday and Wednesday will now be as follows:

TUESDAY 27 JANUARY—Until about seven o'clock, there will be a debate on a Government motion arising out of Mr. Speaker's decision on 22 January.

Afterwards, Second Reading of the Ministry of Defence Police Bill (Lords)

Motions relating to the Dockyard Services (Devonport) (Designation and Appointed Day) Order and the Dockyard Services (Rosyth) (Designation and Appointed Day) Order.

WEDNESDAY 28 JANUARY—Oppostion day (6th allotted day). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion entitled "The failure of the City to serve the nation".

Motion on the London Regional Transport (Levy) Order.

Second Reading of the Parliamentary and Health Service Commissioners Bill will be taken at a later date.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): After the exchanges yesterday on Mr. Duncan Campbell's film and his article in the New Statesman, the House is not surprised that the Leader of the House has made a further business statement today. But why have the Government not tabled a motion on the Order Paper? Is it because it is the Government's intention to seek a limited debate on Mr. Speaker's action yesterday, or are they contemplating a motion that has wider scope and may be much more controversial? When shall we be told the Government's intentions?

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate the point that the right hon. Gentleman makes. The choice of motion is a matter of sensitivity and judgment. The Government are considering the terms of the motion, and will draft and table the motion as soon as practicable.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): When my right hon. Friend considers the terms of the motion, will he ensure that there is nothing in it that might impair the rights of the Select Committees of the House? At the same time, will he ensure that its terms are sufficiently widely drawn to enable those of us who want to do so to debate the extraordinary willingness of some hon. Members to use the procedures of the House to breach the defences of national security?

Mr. Biffen: I can give the undertaking sought by my hon. Friend in respect of Select Committees. I take note of his concern about the terms of the motion in respect of the second point that he makes.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Will the Leader of the House consider using time after the debate on Tuesday for a continuation of the proceedings on the Local Government Finance Bill not for the Ministry of Defence Police Bill [Lords]? Is the Leader of the House aware that the House will be in extraordinary difficulty if the remaining stages of the local government Bill including Report, are taken on Monday? The Government have amended the Bill 38 times. There has to be a Report stage, but under Standing Orders that is not possible until the Committee has reported to the House, which means that the House will not have any copies available of printed amendments.

Mr. Biffen: As the hon. Gentleman will have noted, Monday's business stands unaltered. Perhaps the points that he makes may be considered through the usual channels, but I do not hold out any substantial hope of alteration.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the House will welcome the opportunity to discuss and support the decision that you, Mr. Speaker took in difficult circumstances? When the Government frame the motion will they take into account the fact that any attempt to lay down regulations that may in any way restrict the activities of private Members should not be undertaken lightly or in haste? The decision deserves most careful consideration and should not be taken on Tuesday in the heat of the moment.

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate the point that my hon. Friend makes, and makes more effectively by the moderation with which he puts it.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): This is a delicate balance, but will the Leader of the House lean towards a narrow motion? Will he reflect — if he is thinking of a broader motion—on the debate that took place in the House and the view that was expressed on both sides that a mechanism of scrutiny of the intelligence services, and all the areas that relate to confidentiality, must now be achieved by the House? Some form of procedure involving Members from both sides of the House capable of being given sensitive information in rather carefully guarded circumstances is a necessary part of safeguarding democracy.

Mr. Biffen: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for acknowledging that there is a question of balance when considering how best to proceed with the debate on Tuesday. I note his substantive point. He will recognise that this is somewhat controversial, and no doubt will be raised again and again.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I am sorry that time which had been set aside for deliberation of the Health Service Commissioners Bill should be lost while we spend time debating procedures of the House that have been misused by some people to try and pry into matters that they should be content to leave alone.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend's question contains a degree of controversy, which is a prelude to the lively debate that may take place on Tuesday, but the House would have thought it very remiss if arrangements had not been made for the topic to be taken as speedily as practicable.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): The House will be grateful to the Leader of the House for reacting so positively in respect of your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and Mr. Duncan Campbell's film. But is the Leader of the House satisfied that a proper debate can take place when some Members of the House have seen the film officially, some unofficially, some have seen excerpts of it on ITV and others have read accounts of the film in the New Statesman? Is it not time that the House was encouraged to see what it will debate before the debate?

Mr. Biffen: I shall have to distance myself from that observation, because the debate will essentially deal with the problems of an injunction. If we begin to pick and choose whether we think that the injunction should or should not have been granted, we shall be in some difficulty in these matters.

Agricultural Training Board Bill

Question again proposed. That the Bill be now read a Second time.

11.8 am

Mr. Home Robertson: If we can return from the consideration of a non-existent film about a non-existent spy satellite to the more mundane affairs of the Agricultural Training Board Bill, I shall return to the pattern of the speech that I originally intended to make.

I commence by congratulating the hon. Member for Cornwall, North on his good fortune in achieving the high place in the ballot for private Members' bills, and his choice of the useful and constructive subject. I have some experience in the lottery for Private Members' Bills; last year I came 12th and brought in a Bill, how the Protection of Children Bill (Tobacco) Act, which had widespread support and eventually reached the statute book.

Mr. Thurnham: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Home Robertson: For goodness' sake, the hon. Member has been havering on for some time already. Is it necessary for him to intervene again?

Mr. Thurnham: I want to commend the hon. Gentleman on having brought a Bill forward from 12th in the ballot, that gained acceptance and got on to the statute book. I commend to other people who are drawn in a similar position that they bring forward Bills which will also gain acceptance.

Mr. Home Robertson: I do not have the termerity to advise other hon. Members of the House on what sort of Bills they should bring forward. Hon. Members must make their own choices about the nature of their Bills.

The hon. Member for Cornwall, North has given us a useful opportunity to improve the legislation in relation to the Agricultural Training Board. I am in a rather curious position here, because on the one hand I am the official Opposition spokesman dealing with agriculture and given the responsibility for covering the Bill and its progress through the House; and I am also a sponsor of the Bill, which shows that there is widespread support for the principle of the Bill. Indeed, it is a happy coincidence that this debate comes only one day after the launch of the Labour party's new Green Paper on agricultural policy, which suggests that active steps should be taken to diversify the rural economy and to help farmers to develop new uses for land and buildings in order to protect and promote employment in rural areas. That, as I said before we were interrupted, is in marked contrast to the drift and lack of policy from the Government. I hope that our suggestion will help to promote debate in that area.

It stands to reason that any process of extending and diversifying agriculture and extending employment in rural areas will require training in new skills which may not be directly related to agriculture and horticulture. Therefore, it is vital that steps should be taken to make such training available and the Agricultural Training Board is the obvious candidate for that task.

I am familiar with the activities of the Agricultural Training Board. It has carried out courses on my farm on the maintenance of machinery, the operation of chain saws and other things. The board runs a range of courses on farms and market gardens in my constituency of East Lothian.

However, I have been advised that on at least a couple of occasions current restrictions on the board's scope of activity has cramped its style in potentially useful work in my constituency. A group operating under the community programme of the Manpower Services Commission asked the Agricultural Training Board to assist with training to restore and convert an old farmsteading near Musselburgh in East Lothian for alternative use. But the people on the project were outside the legislative scope of the training board as it stands. Similarly, the Agricultural Training Board was approached by the Lothian health board for help with training some of its staff in the safe spraying of chemicals. Again, that was outside the scope of the board. As I understand it, the Bill will overcome that problem and in that sense it is clearly worth while and necessary.

In my constituency we have been giving much thought to rural development, which has been touched on by several hon. Members—my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) and the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West. In my constituency the East Lothian district council has set up its own rural policy committee, working on a range of initiatives to revive our village and countryside communities. It is imperative that farmers should play their part in that process.

Mercifully, we in East Lothian have been spared the worst ravages of the milk quota cuts, but that is only because there were few dairy farms in that part of the world in the first place. However, East Lothian has some of the most fertile land in Scotland, which is inevitably making its contribution to the cereal surpluses just now. Therefore, it is only a matter of time before drastic changes will have to be imposed on the industry in one form or another. I am determined that the economy and the landscape of the area must be protected in that process.

That means finding new uses for farm buildings and new enterprises on farms—whether tourism, crafts or any of the alternative enterprises that various hon. Members have mentioned, such as sport. Indeed, we have a lot of golf courses in East Lothian already. The open golf championship will take place at Muirfield this year. If anyone is angling for an invitation I will see him afterwards. The Government leak stories to The Observer and other newspapers about some obscure Cabinet committee code named ALURE suggesting that there may be interesting new developments and the lifting of planning restrictions to make it possible for golf courses to be spread all over the countryside, but I suspect that we have enough already in East Lothian. However, that is certainly an idea. What would worry me about that—several hon. Members have talked about the possible lifting of planning restrictions in rural areas—is that I would not like to see Barratts and the like given a free hand to build rural shanty towns all over the countryside. There is a need to retain reasonable planning restrictions, while recognising the need for development and diversification in the rural economy.

There has been some pioneering in agricultural diversification in my constituency. Only a few months ago, I visited a farmer who had started a new enterprise rearing a specialist breed of goats for the production of cashmere, which will apparently be rather lucrative. I can think of a mushroom enterprise and other involving fruit and vegetables, flowers and fish farming — all strictly agricultural operations. In addition, in East Lothian we have had one of the first farming, forestry and wildlife advisory groups in Scotland. Therefore, the farmers in my constituency have shown their willingness to support and protect the environment in that part of the world.

I should like to see a number of ways of encouraging alternative enterprises, whether tourism, craft or other types of industry, and, indeed, forestry. It is important —this is part of the Labour party's new Green Paper on this issue— that there should be a Government scheme to promote the planting of trees on agricultural land, and that must include arable land if it is to have any impact on the production of surpluses.

I have had experience of the agricultural training systems. I went to the West of Scotland college of agriculture, as, I think, did the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart), and the agricultural course that I did there made no mention of trees. No part of that course dealt with how to plant and protect trees, the different species of trees and what types of land were most appropriate for the planting of different types of trees. Farming and forestry have hitherto been completely divorced. There must be changes in that area and that will require specialist training and skills which are not currently covered by the agricultural training board.

I have had several representations from my constituency and other bodies in Scotland showing their support for the Bill. I know that the agricultural workers section of the Transport and General Workers Union in Scotland has shown its support for the Bill, as has the National Farmers Union of Scotland and a valuable and worthwhile pressure group called Rural Forum, which is working for rural development in Scotland. Willie Swan, the chairman of Rural Forum, has written to me saying:

"We believe in Rural Forum that if the ATB is to be able to provide the training which will be required by a diversified agriculture, it should have much wider powers and become in effect a rural training board."

That point has already been made in the debate. Therefore, there is full support for the principles behind the Bill.

I want to raise three specific points, two of which are Committee points for the hon. Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale) of which it is fair to give him notice now, and one broader point which is really for the Minister's attention. My first point concerns the drafting of the Bill and the definition of the people who will be eligible for training under an amendment which refers to "the training and skills relevant to the carrying on of activities not comprised within the industry of persons who are employed in the industry and members of their family."

There is also a case for including people who have been employed in the industry, because many people in rural areas have been made redundant. People are losing their jobs particularly on dairy farms just now. I fear that someone who has been made redundant and is no longer employed on a farm could find himself excluded from the scope of the Bill as it stands. Perhaps we could consider that point in Committee.

My second point has already been touched on. That is the definition of amenity skills which will be eligible for training under schemes within the new legislation. They are defined as "skills which are relevant to the development, improvement, conservation or maintenance of land for sporting, recreational or environmental purposes or the rearing or care of animals for any such purposes."

There is one potentially controversial area about which we should be open, and that is sport.

If a partially publicly funded body is to give training or any kind of support for controversial types of sporting, for example fox hunting or hare coursing, that would give rise to some difficulties. The hon. Gentleman and the Government should be given fair warning of that point, which we shall be able to discuss in Committee.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Does the hon. Gentleman include fishing in those comments about what he may consider to be controversial sports in which some people do not wish to participate?

Mr. Home Robertson: I was not expressing a personal opinion about any of those sports. I was simply putting the point, which I think is self-evident to hon. Members in all parties, that those two sports are controversial and some people feel very strongly against them. I did not include fishing in my remarks; I talked specifically about fox hunting and hare coursing and we shall need to address ourselves to that point in Committee.

My third detailed point is addressed to the Minister and concerns funding. It is all very well for the Government to give a fair wind to a Bill like this and to say that they support the principle of extending the scope of training under the Agricultural Training Board. The Government will be able to say, "Look, aren't we marvellous? We are doing something about rural diversification." I put it to the Minister that, under the Bill, the Government will be doing precious little about rural diversification. All they are doing is altering the terms of the legislation; they are not putting any resources into it.

I recognise the inhibitions on private Members in the drafting of private Members' Bills. However, it would not be beyond the powers of the Minister and the Government to introduce a money resolution of some description which would make it possible to make additional funds available to the board actively to promote the things that all hon. Members are in favour of.

The Government have an appalling record in this area. They have made petty-minded cuts in ADAS, the Scottish agricultural colleges and the availability of advice especially to small farmers who can least afford to pay for advice from ADAS, at the very time when those small marginal enterprises most need advice on how to diversify and remain in business. Such cuts are in marked contrast to the runaway expenditure on intervention buying and bring little credit on the Government. The Minister owes it to the House and the industry to say a little more about funding.

After those few brief remarks, I should like to assure the hon. Member for Cornwall, North that we support the principles of the Bill. I congratulate him again on his good fortune in the ballot and his good judgment in selecting this subject. I hope that the Bill will be on the statute book before long, and that there will be a money resolution to provide sufficient funds so that it will lead to some action in the countryside.

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): It gives me great pleasure to support the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale), which will make further provision with respect to the functions of the Agricultural Training Board.

My association with the training board goes back to its inception 20 years ago, and, as a result, I believe that I should declare an interest. The Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), recalled how we both received our agricultural training at the same college. I cannot imagine what went wrong with the training after I left.

Before I speak on the Bill, I should like to comment on the remarks made by the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mrs. Shields) about the devastating effects of high interest rates on farmers' incomes. The hon. Lady should be aware of the statistics that are available to everybody and which show that more farmers lend money than borrow it. The gross indebtedness to agriculture is carried by the 2,000-acre farmers, about whom she talked, who are supposed to be earning a fortune. The hon. Lady should look at the statistics and make sure that she gets it right for the policy document next week.

During the earlier part of the Agricultural Training Board's life I was an examiner specialising in livestock courses; I still pay my group training membership. Who knows, if the additional provisions become law, I may be able to run a course on the advantages for farmers of political awareness. I am sorry to see that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has gone. I am sure that he believes that farmers are well and truly politically aware now.

In its early days, the ATB had few friends. However, once the advantages that would accrue to the industry and farmers were known, by making use of the board's training and retraining provisions, it has become an integral part of the industry. There would be great hostility if anyone ever suggested ending the Agricultural Training Board.

The highly successful Agricultural Training Board service in the county of Nottinghamshire provides for accurate local assessment of the training needs of farmers and horticulturists, and for a response to those needs, largely in the form of short courses. Those courses are essentially practical and are held for small groups of trainees so that the individuals gain genuine "hands-on" practice under the supervision of highly skilled instructors. In an average year, over 1,500 farmers and farm staff in the county participate in courses that cover a wide range of agricultural and horticultural production and deal with all occupational levels. Virtually all the training is now delivered through the network of nine training groups, to one of which all farmers have reasonably convenient access.

The productivity record of the industry is well known and second to none. That has been brought about by the industry accepting new production methods and technology. However, the importance of the ATB in that achievement was in transferring that knowledge and skills to those employed in the industry. The tremendous success is now evident in the unwanted food surpluses. For no other reason, change to both the industry and its training board must come, but under the present legislation the expertise and training materials that the ATB has developed over 20 years cannot encompass that change, despite requests for it to provide a training service in land maintenance skills and supervisory and management skills, to utilities such as water authorities, electricity boards and local councils. There is also training demand from garden centres, leisure parks and small rural industries.

In my historic and famous constituency of Sherwood, there is a great opportunity to take advantage of the increased tourist activity. The catalyst will be the new centre park holiday village being built in the heart of Sherwood Forest, and costing £32 million. Already one farmer has opened a rare breed section as a tourist attraction on his farm, reducing his output of unwanted cereals. However, the rural community in general will need courses on how to exploit the opportunity from tourism. There is no better organisation than the Agricultural Training Board to teach them how to achieve that goal.

I commend the Bill to the House and am delighted to be associated with it.

11.28 pm

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): I rise to support the Bill wholeheartedly and should like to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale) on his initiative and also on the excellent way in which he has presented his Bill this morning.

The Bill seeks to widen the scope of present Agricultural Training Board and to meet the challenges now facing the industry. I note with pleasure that it will achieve that aim on a self-financing basis.

I was brought up on a farm on the Somerset-Wiltshire border, and I observed the technological revolution in the farming industry over some years. I have seen the British farmer adapt to tremendous change. When I was a small boy, many farm workers milked large herds by hand. Then the vacuum milk bucket was introduced, followed by the line parlour. Now we have the herringbone and rotary parlours. All that has happened in the space of 30 years. It is an incredible change, and has required guts on the part of farmers, in the investment that they have made. We have also seen the effect of that change on the number of people living in the countryside. For example, the difference between the number of people needed to milk a herd of 200 cows by hand compared with the number needed today is tremendous. Thus, there has been a large flow of farm workers from the countryside.

We have seen the British farmer accept tremendous risk in investment, not only in land but in equipment and machinery—and, indeed, in seed fertiliser and stock. At the same time, there has been an enormous increase in productivity. If only British manufacturing industry could have matched even one quarter of farming's productivity increases, we would be in the same position as Japan today. The increase in productivity has also meant a flow of people from farming into other industries, and from the countryside into other activities in small towns.

The British farmer has been constantly urged to produce more and more. He has met that challenge by outstanding management and effort. Many farmers whom I know, particularly in the Winchester and Hampshire area, have achieved dramatic increases in productivity, particularly in cereal production. That was a barren area before the first world war, and land was going for £5 an acre. Increases in productivity have been fantastic. However, now there are massive food surpluses in both North America and Europe. Farmers are being urged to cut back at the same time as real farm incomes are turning downward and farm asset prices are falling.

As I said, people have been driven off the land by technology and increases in productivity. We have seen inflation-led land prices discourage new people from coming into farming, and we have also seen those same inflationary rises in land prices encourage some farmers to sell to major institutions — again resulting in a social denuding of the countryside.

Now there are restrictions on beef production, milk quotas and price restrictions on cereals. All that portends the risk of forcing more farmers off the land, denuding the life of the rural areas yet further. Therefore, we need a real rejuvenation of the rural areas. In order to do so, we have to find alternative uses for land and buildings. We must also find new ways of encouraging rural employment and keeping people in the villages and the country areas. In short, I believe that we must show creativity and flexibility in meeting the challenges that face agriculture. The Bill both allows for and encourages creativity and flexibility. In Hampshire, milk and cereals are in substantial surplus, so the Bill will be widely welcomed there.

Alternative or even additional activities in rural areas might include such things as tourism, with hotel accommodation and so on, and fish farming. In my constituency, we have two famous fish rivers — the Itchen and the Meon. Next door, in the part of my constituency that I lost in the boundary changes, is the river Test. That is of particular interest to the people in my constituency.

There are also opportunities for the direct marketing of farm products, particularly now that there is an accent upon health, natural foods and so on.

These opportunities, fit in very much with the Conservative philosophy on agriculture, of encouraging the British farmer to think beyond producing just for the farm gate, but of selling into the market. In the early 1980s we encountered problems with products such as apples and bacon, illustrating one fault in British agriculture, that our farmers had tended to grow for volume. The Milk Marketing Board and various other boards would buy the food in bulk. The farmer was not thinking of the end consumer; he was thinking of the wholesaler rather the retail consumer. There are still opportunities in that area for initiatives by farmers.

There are also opportunities in value-added products such as cream, cheese and meat products such as sausages and ham. Other opportunities were mentioned by the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), who spoke of recreation. In addition to activities such as nature walks, he mentioned sport and questioned whether any Government money, even indirectly, should be used to finance what he terms controversial sports, such as fox hunting and hare coursing.

In Committee, there must be major concentration on what might be considered controversial — in other words, when people exercise their freedom of choice — and on things that are legal or illegal. If sports such as fox hunting and shooting are legal, there is no problem. I noticed with interest that the hon. Gentleman excluded from his list another blood sport, fishing, which often allows an animal — the fish — to suffocate over many hours. I wondered why until I considered the voting profile of many people who fish. Then I began to see. The hon. Gentleman may — I do not say that he is — be interested not so much in the life of those animals as in his own votes. We must focus on that matter in Committee, if the hon. Gentleman tries to say that, as a legal sport is controversial and he does not support it, the Bill should not cover it.

There are also commercial opportunities, such as garden centres. Farmers might also be encouraged to enter taxi and lorry businesses. With their families, they could carry out activities not instead of, but in addition to, farming. For example, if they ran a lorry business, it could be in support of agriculture.

There are also tremendous opportunities for crafts and light industry. On high technology, a farmer's son and daughter might have gone through different schooling from the one that he enjoyed. Their education might be orientated towards a high technology future. They do not have to leave the farm and live in the city; they could live on the same farm and bring high technology to it.

For the rural areas to remain viable, we must accept that there has to be change. We must protect the environment, and we must maintain a serious grip on the green belt. At the same time, we must show imagination in adapting to the necessary changes. We must not restrict the evolution of life on the farm as the farmers grapple with the challenges of the changed use of land. We must show imagination and flexibility at the same time as retaining the overall goals of protecting the environment. I shall now deal with planning permission, especially on the part of local authorities. I believe that local councillors on planning committees and their staff must be made aware of the need for adaptation on the farms and the implication of the changes that are about to happen. It is our job to make sure that they are made aware. We must remind them that Conservative policy, even at this date, is to encourage the changed use of farm buildings.

The great advantages of high technology are that it is largely clean and non-pollutant. It does not have to be concentrated around coal or a certain market, distribution centre or labour. It can be well diversified into the country. In fact, a farm provides a good site. It has access for the odd van or lorry delivery, it has utilities and buildings. Some of the At cost barns are easily adapted to all sorts of uses on the inside. Of course, the farms are in the country, often in a fold in the ground out of the wind. Therefore, the conversion of a farm into a high technology site would have very little impact on the environment.

However, mistakes can be made and one nearly happened in my constituency. In the village of Kingsworthy the intention was to concentrate all the high technology of the area into one place and to build a huge high technology park that completely engulfed and dwarfed the local village and created its own environmental problems. It was being slipped through under the guise of high technology, when it was light industry. High technology does not require a major concentration. I urge local authority planning committees to look seriously at farms as a wonderful option for areas in which high technology can grow in a non-pollutant way.

For 20 years the Agricultural Training Board has offered a training service in Hampshire, often in conjunction with the county agricultural college at Sparsholt. It now offers over 1,100 courses. The grass-roots organisation in Hampshire is in the hands of eight agriculture and two horticulture training groups with over 30 per cent. of all Hampshire farmers and growers active at any one time. Therefore, there is real participation in Hampshire and I know that there will be great interest in this Bill.

The Bill will allow farmers not only to take courses in farm management, as they do now, but to take courses that will help them adopt new forms of land and asset use to meet the challenges of the industry. It will also allow people from urban areas to become involved in activities in the country and it will encourage people back into the villages and restore vibrancy. It will provide opportunities for people in urban areas, especially deprived areas, to live in the country and play a full part in the country communities. It will encourage other bodies such as equestrian centres, local authorities and the National Trust to participate in the rejuvenation of rural areas more actively than at present.

As I have said, the Bill is self-financing and will contribute greatly to adapting and continuing country life. I offer it my full supprt and congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North on his welcome initiative. I should like to wish him good luck in furthering the Bill through the processes of the House.

Mr. Colin Shepherd (Hereford): I should like to add my congratulations to those already expressed to my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale) on taking the opportunity to bring forward his Bill to widen the powers of the Agricultural Training Board. If one comes high or at the top of the private Members' ballot, it is tempting to take some apparently sensational step that will leave the Member concerned covered in glory, or something else, for ever and a day. Therefore, to take a measure which is of such enormous importance but without instant box office appeal, shows responsibility for which my hon. Friend should be commended.

The fact that the Bill does not have immediate box office appeal does not in any way detract from the vital significance it has for the countryside. Hon. Members from both sides of the House have already picked up the significance of the changes happening today.

Twelve months ago we were involved in the early proceedings of what is now the Agriculture Act 1986 and we spent much time talking about rural diversification. We spent hours in Committee dealing with the fine points of the desirability of rural diversification and at the end of the procedures, the Act included a clause that enabled Ministers to be able to encourage rural diversification on a broader basis than had been envisaged when the Bill was first drafted. I was particularly grateful for that. However, at the moment Ministers do not have the ability to bring forward funds directly to be able to encourage that. We are not talking about funding today because the fact that the Bill is private Member's legislation means that there cannot be an extension of public expenditure involved. However, we are talking about broadening the base of opportunity for rural diversification and that is a good thing.

When looking at rural diversification we must deal with the question of training so that people can take advantage of the opportunities that are being presented and sought every day. The training facilities in my part of the world are already fairly good under the Agricultural Training Board and I am told that in my county there are already 17 training groups dealing with the training needs of agriculture and horticulture. Hon. Members do not need to be reminded of the importance of agriculture and horticulture to the county.

It is significant that, in the year ending 31 March 1987, the training groups will have held almost 500 short practical courses in a wide range of skills from craft level to management to meet—this is the important point—the locally identified needs of the members' businesses. It is a good thing that most of the courses are held on farms with the facilities provided by group members. Trainees learn by doing, and "hands on" practice under the supervision of skilled instructors and tutors is a good and effective way of using funds.

In addition to subjects primarily concerned with husbandry and production, there has been a recent surge of interest in courses designed to improve the financial and business management of farmers and growers. I cannot underline the importance of that point too strongly. Far too often over the years, that dimension has gone by default.

The industry's increase in coherence at present makes it imperative that everyone involved in agriculture and horticulture is as fully aware of the financial dimensions in operation as every other engineering or professional enterprise. They cannot afford to have any aspect of their enterprise financially unquantified at the moment.

I gather that horticulture businesses, which are of great significance in my part of the world, have taken advantage of a new series of Agricultural Training Board courses designed to prepare newly appointed supervisors for their responsibilities in the management of people and processes. That is welcome, because the margins of horticulture become ever less as the industry becomes more competitive and expert. However, significantly, it has been reported to me that it has not been possible, because of the present limitations of the Agricultural Training Board's scope, to respond to growing requests for training in woodland management, tourist and recreational developments and the valuable production of milk and meat products. Those areas particularly relate to rural diversification of the first order, not the rural diversification referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) but that first line of rural diversification in the countryside where it is clearly apparent to those involved with the countryside that they have an additional aspect of business which can be expanded.

I am told that there is also an unsatisfied demand for training in agricultural skills from individuals and organisations which manage land for purposes other than food production. The Bill will contribute enormously to the satisfaction of those demands that at present are unsatisfied. For that reason, it must be commended.

I want to take this opportunity to raise a particular point with the Minister which he may not necessarily be able to answer today. However, it is right that we should be aware of the difficulties that face tenants on agricultural holdings when they seek to diversify their businesses. That reflects very much on their willingness to take up training opportunities.

The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) said that he hoped that no one would read the proceedings on this debate. I hope that they will be read by the Country Landowners Association and the National Farmers Union, because there is a problem at the heart of this matter. Written into the model tenancy agreement, which is so often the foundation of the landlord-tenant agreement, is the provision that a tenant may not diversify or undertake business outside the narrow scope of agriculture without the agreement of the landlord. On the face of it, that may be a sensible provision. However, at the moment it means that many tenants are in contravention of their tenancy agreements if they carry out bed and breakfasting.

It has been brought to my attention by a constituent who sought to diversify his operation by creating a model farm specialising in rare breeds that his landlord immediately said that he wanted an enhanced rent or a share of the take. We are concerned with the unfettering of the tenant so that he may utilise his holding within a far wider scope of definition of agricultural or countryside activity so as to be able to pay the rent that he has agreed to pay in the light of his lessening ability to indulge in the full production for which the tenancy agreement was drawn up in the first place.

This point may not strictly be within the terms of the Bill, but it very much affects the ability or willingness of those in the countryside to take the training opportunities created under the Bill. That condition in model tenancies is a positive disincentive to training opportunities proposed in the Bill. I plead with those who are in a position to change matters to recognise that the current provisions of the model tenancy inhibit the future of rural diversification in the countryside. All landowners who operate under model tenancy agreements should desire a full and healthy scope of activity in the countryside.

Once again, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North on having identified and laid on the table another piece in the jigsaw puzzle which is confronting agriculture and the countryside in shaping their future. That has been an invaluable contribution, for which he must be fully commended. I look forward to seeing the Bill progress through Committee and on to the statute book.

11.54 am

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Donald Thompson): First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale) on obtaining the Bill and on the first-class way in which he presented it. Normally, I would have noted what he said and skilfully woven his comments into my speech—

Mr. Home Robertson: Speech?

Mr. Thompson: Yes. — and everybody would have been satisfied. I must thank hon. Members who have contributed to the debate. I know that some of them live in far corners of the United Kingdom, so I shall deal with my hon. Friend's comments first and then proceed to the more general aspects of the Bill and comments from Opposition Members.

As the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) lives furthest away and has important business in his constituency, I shall deal first with his comments. I thank him for welcoming the Bill and, indeed, for sponsoring it. I know that the Labour party is genuinely worried about diversification and I was surprised that he could not resist making a little dig at the Government. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman brought the support of agriculture workers, the Scottish farmers unions and Rural Forum, all of which will be of great benefit to my hon. Friend during the passage of the Bill.

I listened with interest to what the hon. Gentleman said about trees. We agree that trees will play a great part in the diversification programme to come, so any training given in the growing of trees will be for the better. I took his point about fox hunting and hare coursing. This Bill is no vehicle for any discord. Although some of my hon. Friends may disagree slightly, I do not want the Bill to include anything that could cause discord in future. We seem to have general agreement about that. The hon. Gentleman will be pleased to hear that, but not pleased to hear——

Mr. Home Robertson: The Minister has no money.

Mr. Thompson: I need not continue. The hon. Gentleman asked questions to which he knew the answer and that is not within the rules of the House. There is no money, at this time and we shall have no money resolution on the Bill at present. We shall see how it goes, as Ministers say from this Dispatch Box.

We must diversify. As the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch)—he sends apologies for his absence—and my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) said, we are in the middle of an agricultural revolution. It started before the common agricultural policy started. During the past 25 years the United Kingdom has doubled its cereal production from 7 million to 15 million tonnes, its sugar beet production has risen 30 per cent., milk production 50 per cent., beef and veal production 50 per cent., mutton and lamb production 40 per cent., pig meat 140 per cent. and, most dramatic, there has been a tenfold increase in poultry production. All that has been achieved on a declining area of agricultural land.

Back in 1967, when I was a county councillor, people were talking about how awful it was to continue building because we would run out of land and would end up starving outside our houses. That has not happened. [Interruption.] There is no sign of that with me. One would not expect the Minister for Food to look as though he had never had a good meal in his life, and I do not intend to.

With that background, we are happy to welcome the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North gave a good outline of the Bill, and I am sure that he will endeavour to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in a moment to wind up. He covered many of the matters that have since been covered. The Bill was well explained by him, and it was also explained that it will be self-funding.

The hon. Member for Ipswich sent me his apologies. He is another sponsor of the Bill. I agree with him that the Bill will lead to a ground change in agricultural training. Both he and my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North mentioned their local training schemes, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) a moment ago. I am glad to add my congratulations to the training schemes going on in north Yorkshire, west Yorkshire and south Yorkshire. Those schemes seem to be successful.

My hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West had some hard things to say about planning. He made an important point about training people in the welfare of animals and how the Bill will extend people's awareness of the need properly to look after animals. The Government have set up the Farm Animals Welfare Council to guide them on the welfare of animals. We look forward to and often receive comments, upon which we often act, from organisations such as Compassion in World Farming, the RSPCA and other welfare groups. My hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West and I shall have no truck whatsoever with the lunatic fringe. We shall encourage farmers and the farming community to see that such lunatics are caught and imprisoned with the full severity of the law.

I was a little disappointed by the sour reception of the Bill by the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mrs. Shields). She comes from an area with almost no unemployment—3 per cent. or 4 per cent.—yet she, like many of her colleagues, would have us believe that the whole of the north of England is painted black. I am as lucky as she is to live in a most beautiful part of the country.

Mr. Alistair Burt (Bury, North): It cannot be that beautiful—it is not in Lancashire.

Mr. Thompson: No, it is not in Lancashire, it is in Yorkshire. Conservative Members consider that small farmers—my constituency is made up of small farmers—are the backbone of the farming industry. The Bill will give a great deal of help to those small farmers who wish to take it.

It is not demeaning for a farmer's wife to put on bed and breakfast, as opposed to getting up early in the morning to feed the chickens or the calves. Perhaps the chickens and the calves have more interesting conversation, but it is a change of job. The farming community, and small farmers especially, will welcome the ability to move into training. I shall not deal with alliance farming policies, the Liberal farming policy for the north, the SDP farming policy for the south, or any of their multiplicity of policies.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) made a welcome wide-ranging contribution that has already been commented upon. My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) made an interesting point about the Sherwood forest leisure park. Leisure parks were looked upon with fear only a few years ago, but now people all over the country are competing. Leisure parks and theme parks give a great deal of employment to people living in the surrounding countryside. I was glad to hear that my hon. Friend welcomed the leisure park in his constituency.

It was nice to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) talk so knowledgeably about farming. I have often been instructed by his speeches on finance in all its rarified aspects. Perhaps he is moving with the City into farming—a better bet, perhaps.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): He is diversifying.

Mr. Thompson: Yes.

I was pleased to hear what my hon. Friend said about anglers. Tomorrow night, I shall speak to anglers in Todmorden. Anglers are considered to be an integral important part of the sport and recreation community. My hon. Friend pointed out that there are more people involved in angling than in any other sport. Conservative Members have not forgotten the needs of anglers compared with the needs of those in many other sports.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hereford made an expert contribution and saw the point of the Bill exactly. He added to the pleas of others on the need for trainers and training. He was right to mention the value of value-added products. About 46 per cent of the butter manufactured this year in the United Kingdom was immediately put into intervention butter. If it could have been put into cheese, yogurt or other value-added products, the whole of British farming industry would have been much more prosperous.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hereford directed his last point specifically at me. It concerned diversification and the tenant and the landlord getting a fair crack of the whip. Harmonisation can only be achieved by those associations that deal with and look after tenants and landlords. I hope that they read Hansard carefully, as my hon. Friend requested.

I think that I have covered most of the points raised. Many hon. Members have referred to planning as important. It is often argued that the planning system prevents farmers from diversifying into other activities. The Government are sensitive to the needs of farmers seeking to diversify, and recent circular advice from the Department of the Environment to local planning authorities illustrates this. For example, circular 2/86 "Development by Small Businesses" draws together advice from previous circulars over the freeing of redundant farm buildings for other uses — for instance, small-scale commercial or industrial ventures to help diversify the rural economy, and also refers to the importance of leisure facilities in contributing to employment being underlined in a report "Pleasure, Leisure and Jobs, The Business of Tourism", which was published in July 1985. The point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West about the small business which tried to occupy the disused chapel on the edge of a village is covered by those references.

Green belt policy is often singled out as a particular constraint on farmers in those areas. The Government's policy on the development in green belts is set out in Department of the Environment circular 14/84, annex A, which says:

> "Inside a Green Belt, approval should not be given, except in very special circumstances, for the construction of new buildings or for the change of use of existing buildings for purposes other than agriculture, sport, cemeteries, institutions standing in extensive grounds, or other uses appropriate to a rural area".

Where planning permission is sought for new uses of redundant agricultural buildings, it is for the local planning authority to consider the application by reference to this policy and any other material consideration. But it would be appropriate to take into account, where material, the need to diversify the rural economy by encouraging new types of employment and enterprise. Redundant agricultural buildings can provide suitable accommodation for small firms or tourist activities, or can be used for individual residences, without detriment to the green belt and to the benefit of the local community, especially where the buildings are of attractive appearance and can be expected with normal repair and maintenance to last for many years. In deciding planning applications for new uses of redundant agricultural buildings, I would expect local authorities to have regard to these considerations.

It is not just in remote country areas where planning authorities seem to lose their way in these measures. We should encourage planning authorities, wherever possible, to diversify in an environmentally sensitive way. There is nothing the matter with that phrase. It means exactly what it says. We should do so in a way that everyone who wants enterprises established can accept. If that is done carefully and gently, without banner waving and silliness on either side, far more jobs will be created and people can use the provisions in the Bill widely.

[Mr. Thompson]

The Bill will involve all sorts of advisory services. The agencies include the Development Commission, the Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas, the Forestry Commission, the Countryside Commission, the Nature Conservancy Council, the English Tourist Board, and the sports councils. All those bodies can give grants and offer advice on various aspects of diversification at local level. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food works closely with them. Some enterprising farmers have successfully expanded beyond traditional activities without financial help from outside. It is the Government's policy to provide incentives in the form of grants where they can be of most help. That is one reason why we do not need a money resolution for this Bill, because the money to do the job is already available in many cases from other areas.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does my hon. Friend, who will be coming up to my constituency in Stafford shortly and will be discussing these questions with local farmers and others involved in the rural economy, agree that enterprise agencies also have an important role here in dovetailing with all the important bodies that he has just mentioned?

Mr. Thompson: I certainly agree that enterprise agencies do and should dovetail.

In commenting on the Bill, I have sketched over much that I have to say, as it has been said ably and wll by other Conservative Members today. This Bill will be welcomed not just by the Agricultural Training Board but by the agricultural industry and by many other interests that the Bill will enable the board to serve. On behalf of the Government, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North on bringing the Bill forward, and I commend it to the House.

12.15 pm

Mr. Neale: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall reply to the debate.

I am most grateful to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for his kind remarks. There is a wide measure of agreement on what he said about planning. That applies to those who are involved in farming as well as to others in rural areas. Matters of the sort that we have been discussing should be dealt with in a way that is environmentally sensitive. As my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) said, it is always a matter of balance. It is only when rigidity is applied by planning authorities that great upset can be caused.

An example arose recently in my constituency when a proposal was agreed by my parish council, the local people and the district council, but the county council found that a change of use on a farm which was well tucked away amounted to an infringement of the structure plan, and accordingly turned it down. That is an example of how a farmer's efforts to diversify were brought to naught.

I thank hon. Members on both sides of the House who have spoken so kindly about the Bill. It is clear that there is widespread agreement about the need to accept that there is difficulty in farming in rural areas. The hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Wertch) talked of the need for a farming and countryside policy. My hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West talked about a rural revival. The hon. Member for Ryedale (Mrs. Shields) spoke of the trauma of some small farmers. My hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) spoke kindly of the Bill and talked about the social denuding that is taking place in rural areas because of changes in farming. These speeches are of common concern and will be confronted to some extent by the Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) introduced us to a considerable number of members of his own family: I confess that I rather lost count. He may have appeared to range slightly wide of the Bill, but one of the critical features which singles it out from many others of its kind is that it confronts the problem of farmers' family members and the wives of farm workers, who can participate so much in the diversification process. They too would be able to obtain some training under the Bill. That is most important.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) and the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) — the hon. Gentleman was kind enough to tell me that he would be watching the clock carefully as he is due to attend a constituency engagement, and I suspect that many others are in that position— acknowledged the need to establish alternative skills and to encourage small farmers as well as those employed on small farms, and large farms, too, to take up the opportunities that would be open under the Bill. It was interesting to hear of the hon. Gentleman's participation in that process.

It is not the Bill's purpose to allow the board to duplicate other courses. The Bill is a sincere attempt to provide opportunities that will plug the gaps that now exist. In any event, it would be necessary for the board to seek approval for the various forces that it wishes to establish.

My hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West hit the nail on the head when he said that there is a need to accept change. As the hon. Member for Cornwall, North, I have a warm regard for my hon. Friend, who has helped me over the years on agriculture matters. That is a fundamental aspect that affects agriculture at present, its need to accept change and face realities.

The hon. Member for Ryedale was somewhat critical of the Government, although she did say that the Bill would have alliance support, for which I am grateful. In my research and preparation concerning the Bill, I have not found one example to suggest that the Government have in any way been unaware of what has happened and unaware of the changes that must be faced in agriculture. I did not seen any sign of a lack of enthusiasm in terms of solutions to advance those changes.

After my discussions with members of the farming community, I suggest that we should not under-estimate their real desire to face the changes and their wish to seize the opportunities for training and help. For many, the changes have been traumatic. There has been a great deal of anxiety and apprehension when it has become apparent that the customs and ways of business which have been followed for generations are no longer relevant.

Although I have no illusions that the Bill will transform all British agriculture, I pick up the remarks kindly made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) and I hope that the Bill will contribute in some way to help the entire farming industry to cope with the changes, diversify and improve itself on the foundation of the great successes which have already taken place since the war.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order, No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

AIDS (Control) Etc. Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I beg to move, That the bill be now read a Second time.

Parliament can be in no doubt about the threat of AIDS to our society. According to the December figures 610 AIDS cases had been registered in the United Kingdom, and about half those people had already died. When the Secretary of State for Social Services opened the AIDS debate on 21 November he estimated that there were about 30,000 HIV — human immune deficiency virus — carriers in the country. We know that the median time between becoming infected and developing AIDS is around five years, and according to latest estimates it is likely that about 40 per cent. of those infected with the virus will acquire AIDS within five years.

There is no cure for AIDS. Everyone who has the disease dies of it. It was first described only in 1981, and although a great deal has been learnt about it since then there is no good ground for believing that a cure will be discovered in the next few years.

Edinburgh is especially concerned about the disease. Although two thirds of the AIDS cases to which I referred occurred in the London area, hon. Members will be aware that in Edinburgh well over 50 per cent. of injecting drug misusers are HIV carriers. It is feared—I do not think there can be any doubt about it—that in a few years the percentage of the population who will develop AIDS in Edinburgh will be higher than in any other city in the United Kingdom.

We had a useful debate on 21 December, when the Government announced their public education campaign, which I support. I believe that the campaign, and the work of many broadcasters and journalists throughout the country, has helped to raise public awareness of this issue. It is vital that people should learn about the facts.

We have learnt a great deal about the disease. We know how it is transmitted. We know also that people understand the facts about the disease. If they respond to the guidance that they receive, they can reduce to a negligible level their chances of becoming infected. However, it has to be assumed that there will not be a cure for some considerable time. Even on the best assumptions about the efficacy of the Government's campaign and the response to it by society as a whole, this crisis will be with us until the end of the century. It is the biggest public health crisis for over half a century.

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): I strongly support the Bill and congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on introducing it. However, in view of the speed of events, does he think that an annual report is sufficient?

Mr. Strang: I shall deal with that point when I turn to the provisions of the Bill.

If enacted, the Bill will make an important contribution to our fight against the disease. Other steps will have to be taken, and I have no doubt that they will be taken. In some respects the Bill will complement the work that the Government have already set in hand.

In response to the intervention of the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James), it might be helpful if I take hon. Members through the Bill. Clause 1 is the substantive clause, and subsection (1) spells out the central purpose of the Bill. It lays a statutory duty on every district health authority in England and Wales, and on every health board in Scotland, to produce an annual report on AIDS. The first report will become available to Parliament on 1 February 1988. The statistical data will refer to the position at 30 November of the previous year. Therefore, the data included in the first published report will relate to what has happened up to 30 November 1987.

The Government will be obtaining data continuously and they may choose to ask for monthly or quarterly statistics. There is a very real case to be made for laying a statutory requirement on district health authorities to produce reports. However, it would be unwise to ask for more than one report each year. An annual report is the right approach for Parliament and the wider public, but the Government may choose to ask for more frequent reports from the district health authorities and health boards.

Subsection (2) sets out the prescribed form for each report. If the data from the reports can be collated, it will then be easy to compare the reports. Therefore, it is necessary to lay down a format that can be developed subsequently.

Clause 1(2) lays down the areas which the report should cover. Paragraphs (a) to (e) refer to the statistics in relation to 30 November of the previous year; that is, the number of sufferers, the percentage of the population, and the number of carriers. Those data are of great importance. There may be some scope for making adjustments to the precise nature of the data required, but it is vital that the figures should be available to Parliament for each district health authority and health board.

Paragraphs (a) to (e) relate to the past, and paragraph (f) asks the boards and authorities to estimate the number of persons who are likely either to become infected by the virus or to develop AIDS in the next 12 months. Paragraph (g) is important, because it is crucial that we recognise that this is a report not on what the authority has done, but on everything being done within the area of the authority in relation to AIDS. It will help to promote better co-ordination between the different agencies—the local authorities as well as the health authorities and voluntary bodies. It is vital that we have a report on treatment and counselling—counselling is important to the high-risk groups—those who become carriers and are known to be carriers, and, those who sadly, develop AIDS.

Paragraph (h) relates to the action taken not only by the authority or board, but by public agencies and voluntary organisations to control the spread of the virus. Paragraph (i) relates to education. This is important. I do not intend to criticise the Government's campaign—I am sure that the Minister will acknowledge this—but a media campaign can only be part of the process of education. It is important that we have an annual report on what is being done in the schools and elsewhere to educate people and give them the facts about the disease, thus enabling them to alter their lifestyles and reduce their chances of becoming infected. Paragraph (j) enables the Secretary of State to bring forward additional requirements for information in the report. This is the substantive clause.

Clauses 2 and 4 relate to Northern Ireland because the Bill will apply to England, Scotland and Wales.

Clause 3 contains a provision which may not be necessary. We may reach a judgment which accepts that there is not any significant net increase in public expenditure for the purposes of the Bill.

The Bill has broad professional support, including that of the British Medical Association. In practice, the work will be done by the AIDS co-ordinator and his staff, but I believe that the statutory requirement on the authorities and the boards to produce the first report by February 1988 will have the effect of galvanising them into action where this is needed. There is no question but that a range of organisations must become involved. The Government have an overriding responsibility, and local authorities have a major responsibility, but society as a whole has a responsibility and I hope that one effect of the Bill will be to help to galvanise the areas into action.

Secondly, there is no doubt that the Bill will provide a viable data base. I stress that it is essential that that data should be publicly available. In a sense, the nub of the Bill is that information will be published and made available to Members of Parliament, the local media and everyone else and it will be easy to collate. Indeed, one assumes that that will be done on a regional and national basis.

Thirdly—this comes up at conferences on the issue—different professionals would like to learn about what is happening in other areas. I shall not name the English authorities, but some are well up front and must be applauded for that. At least one is represented on the Conservative Benches today. But Edinburgh is well down the road in taking action, while other authorities have not yet started. The social work department is planning a hospice and all the work is well in hand. We shall, sadly, be hit within a year or so with perhaps up to 100 AIDS cases. There is a strong wish among professionals to learn more about what is happening in the different areas, and the reports will enable that to happen.

Fourthly, the Bill will achieve better co-ordination within the areas. The very fact that the report has to cover not just the authority but all the public agencies and voluntary organisations will enable that to happen. There will have to be good co-ordination. There is a great challenge to society in caring for the sufferers.

I was at a religious conference yesterday organised by Scottish Television, attended by people of all denominations, not just Christians, and there was a real recognition on the part of the Church leaders that the churches and everyone else could make a contribution to the work in the voluntary sector if they so wished. Parliament and the public will be better able to understand the scale of the problem as a result of the reports.

Sixthly, the Bill will be important for resource planning. In London, but also in Edinburgh and other parts of the country, decisions already have to be taken in relation to provisions for the sufferers of AIDS, and, of course, counselling.

Seventhly, and finally, as I have said, we shall be dealing with this problem for the rest of the century. The reports will help us to evaluate the success of society's efforts to combat the disease.

The Bill will make an important contribution to meeting the challenge of AIDS. This means that it will help us to reduce the rate of spread and to support the sufferers and their families.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): I congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on having brought the Bill before the House and I am proud to have been associated with him as one of its sponsors. I understand that at this early stage in our coming to terms with this major epidemic, it is much better to advance steadily from a base of agreed knowledge than to panic and rush into extreme activity.

However, while I welcome the Bill, it is proper to say that in the comparatively short term it does not go far enough. I say that advisedly because the largest experience of the disease and unfortunately — or, in one sense, fortunately — its most dramatic incidence is overseas. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East said that the hallmark of almost all the professionals operating in this area is that they are desperate to get as much information as they can from one another, whether they are within the boundaries of the United Kingdom or outside them.

Yesterday I went to my first meeting as a newly elected member of the council of the Save The Children Fund and was impressed to learn of the considerable co-operation between the international voluntary organisations dealing with AIDS, and of the sophistication of much of the thinking that they are putting in to their handling of the matter. Very real lessons can be learned for the collection of information for which the Bill is pressing. It is, for example, true to say that the Edinburgh office of the Save The Children Fund is co-ordinating the Save The Children Fund effort. One of the hallmarks of the large voluntary organisations is that all of them have seen the vital importance of informing their staff about the disease and how to handle it in their work. Many of those organisations are, of course, screening their volunteers and workers before they take up their posts abroad and have already developed an encouraging level of communication with their staff about the dangers of the disease.

I ask the Minister to assure the House that the Government are pressing upon firms that send people overseas the need to exercise the same amount of responsible communication with their staff that the international voluntary organisations seem to be able to do.

The scale of the disease has already been discussed in the House on several occasions and I shall not go into it in great detail. However, it is worth remembering that in Kinshasa alone about 45,000 cases have been confirmed out of a population of 3 million. That is a sizeable and terrifying figure. The World Health Organisation has pointed out that about 86,000 cases have already been notified from the Americas, the bulk of which come from the USA. Therefore, as we know, this is not a small matter.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): Like the hon. Gentleman, I am a supporter of the Bill and I have followed very closely and with great interest what he is saying. He said that he wished that the Bill went a bit further. A doctor of my acquaintance used those very words to me two or three days ago. I asked the doctor what he would like the Bill to contain that it does not contain already, and the chap could not answer the question. Therefore, I put it to the hon. Gentleman: what would he like to see in the Bill that is not there?

Mr. Rowe: I should like to see two things. First, I should like to see a statement about the extent to which health authorities are co-operating with and learning from international agencies, because that is something that they could usefully do. Secondly, I am not wholly satisfied that the Bill, as it stands, demands enough information about the progress of educational and counselling procedures. We could consider those two points with advantage later on.

It is interesting that people in the countries where there is much greater experience of the disease have learnt two things. First, in most of the countries where it is most obvious, it is transmitted principally by heterosexual rather than homosexual activity. That is a matter of enormous importance for the public in this country to understand. Secondly, those people have already learnt the lesson, which our medical people have not been slow to learn, that it is possible to sterilise equipment in ways that kill the disease, and it is possible for simple sterilisation and anti viral procedures to be operated. The virus cannot survive in temperatures much above 60 deg C. It is killed by household bleach. It cannot survive an attack by chlorine. Those are important matters, when people think of the disease as a monster about which one can do nothing of substance.

Already, in many parts of the world it is clear that if one could make absolutely certain that the blood used for transfusions and the blood products used in operations and for other purposes were properly sterile, one could give the spread of the disease a considerable check. Those are matters upon which we need to make as much progress as possible.

I should like to refer to the reaction at home to AIDS sufferers. Even if it is difficult to measure it in the information that will be required of health authorities, we should not lose sight of it. In the current issue of the Community Care magazine there is a horrifying story. A young man was arrested during an affray and cried out that he had AIDS. He was instantly treated as some sort of pariah and leper. It was a sorry saga of how the social work staff, the police and every one else reacted to him. I should hate to see that repeated on a wide scale.

We already know that some workers in the public health system, in the social service departments of some local authorities, and so on will not go into the house of someone who has been shown to have positive signs of AIDS in his blood — not even an AIDS case. That information should be treated with extreme confidentiality anyway. That shows the desperate need for much better information and education for those who are naturally anxious not to catch the disease while serving the public in the way in which they have been recruited to do.

That raises the matter of who make the most appropriate counsellors for those who are known to have the disease or to be at risk. There is a strong case for saying that some counsellors, particularly people disseminating information and education to young people, should themselves be young people. I have dealings with a voluntary organisation that is anxious to be allowed to put its long experience of using young people to educate young people to work, in producing a breed of AIDS counsellors who will be able to go round schools and youth clubs and talk, as contemporaries, to people at risk about the ways in which to avoid the disease. In some cases they might go further than that and offer counselling to those who have contracted it. Any reports produced by the health authorities could give some suggestion of the scale of that sort of work.

[Mr. Rowe]

I believe that we are going seriously wrong in Britain in our debate about sexuality and people's personal sexual lives. Those local authorities—I am not as trenchant in my criticism of them as some of my colleagues—which advertise for lesbians to work in particular areas have got the wrong end of the stick. People's sexual lives are a private matter and it becomes a matter of public interest or of concern to a wider group than the individual and their immediate family only if, in some way or another, they are wrongfully involving other people in it. It is of no importance whether a school teacher is homosexually inclined as long as the children in his care have no reason to know that and no reason to feel threatened by it.

The same is true of heterosexual activity. It does not matter how people express themselves heterosexually in the privacy of their own homes with consenting partners. It matters only if it seems to interfere with the way in which they do their work and the relationships they have with people in their care. If we could get back to an understanding of that I believe that we would considerably diminish the very real danger that I perceive, which is that people who are known, by whatever mechanism, to have AIDS will be victimised.

I am prepared to bet that many people who are diagnosed as having positive indications in the blood will, in the initial horror of the revelation, be far too free in telling people about it. It is a human reaction to share it with everyone and news will get around. Those people will be shunned, ignored and ill treated by our society unless we have a much more balanced view of the causes of AIDS. After all, there will be many more people in a few years who could not conceivably have contracted the disease through immoral or improper practices. They may contract it by being married to someone who did not even know they had it when they got married. Therefore, it will be improper to discriminate against them or to stigmatise them.

It is important that there should be good education about how the disease is contracted. There should be good counselling for everybody about how to handle people who have the disease and, above all, there should be a much clearer understanding that people's private sexual lives are their own concern, unless and until they interfere with or threaten someone outside. For those reasons, I believe that the more information we can have on this epidemic the better it will be..I welcome the Bill.

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): I welcome the constructive and useful Bill that has been introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang). It seems to initiate some sort of long-term strategy for combating AIDS. Clearly, it is a modest Bill, but it is a measure that will be of long-term practical use to Parliament and hopefully, and more importantly in many ways, to the people who have to tackle AIDS at local level — such as those who are in daily contact with the disease.

When I first read the Bill my immediate reaction was, "What does it do?" It is very modest in its language. When I read it, I thought, "Where are the references to screening, needles and — dare I say it — to condoms?" My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East was right to leave out those complex problems and to tackle this specific part of the question.

I have very positive views about what action the Government should be taking to tackle the wider question. The Select Committee on Social Services is currently considering these issues and I am sure that all hon. Members look forward to an early and clear response from that Committee.

The Bill recognises the clear splits that exist between the Government and the "experts". It recognises the division and the impossibility of a private Member introducing legislation that would take into account all the various aspects of this terrible problem which presents moral dilemmas for the Government and society. The Bill introduces measures to which certainly no one could possibly object. These measures should have been in practice for a number of years, if only we had woken up to the problem earlier.

I note that the Bill provides that the report which each district health authority will have to produce will be in a "prescribed form". That means that the figures that will be produced will be based on standard criteria throughout Britain. That will provide more accurate statistics than any that exist now. However, there is no point in producing statistics for the sake of it. The figures of cases of AIDS and HIV carriers will allow a targeting of funds to cope with the disease which is not possible at the moment. I am aware that the Secretary of State has now received proposals from district health authorities in that area. The Bill will make that process much easier and more accurate for all concerned.

The very fact that district health authorities will have to produce a report will galvanise those more reluctant authorities into action over AIDS. I am sure that hon. Members will recognise that in some areas the reaction is still, "It can't happen here," or, "Even if it does happen here, it cannot affect us." We have a duty in Parliament to explain to people that this is not a problem which unfortunately affects a small number of people or one group of people. It can affect everyone.

Obviously, some areas have already had more experience than others in dealing with AIDS. The cumulative figures for the total number of AIDS cases until the end of December 1986, as my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East said, show that, of the 610 cases in the United Kingdom, the North West Thames regional health authority has 302 and altogether, London has 473 cases. However, there are just two cases in Northern Ireland.

The Bill will facilitate the process whereby authorities in Northern Ireland would be able to gain easy access to the experience of, for example, the North West Thames regional health authority or any other area and learn from its success or failure. The report would also show those areas without a large number of AIDS cases at present, but which are expecting what might almost be called an explosion of cases in the next 12 months. In that respect, I can mention Edinburgh. I do not recall that my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East referred to this point, but there was an explosion in Edinburgh in the 1970s of hepatitis B, which caused many problems. There are parallels with AIDS, but only in the sense that it came about through drug injection. We must look at the experience and knowledge that Edinburgh gained from that, which I am sure it will be only too willing to pass on to district health authorities.

Clause 1(2)(j) allows the Secretary of State to add to the Bill any extra provision which he feels is necessary and I hope that he will bear in mind how the disease affects women. The history of AIDS in England and Wales is closely identified with gay men. Indeed, the less informed, and perhaps more reactionary, among us liked to refer to it as the "gay plague".

Mr. Mikardo: Some still do.

Ms. Richardson: Indeed, some still do.

However, that is not the case in Scotland or other parts of the world. AIDS is not a gay disease, never has been and never will be. It spread among the gay community in London mainly because it was introduced there. In the United States of America it spread from San Francisco, where there is a greater concentration of gay men, to the rest of the country.

The repression and, often, discrimination of gay people sometimes brings pressures which result in their having a high number of sexual partners. The experience in Scotland is that the AIDS virus, HIV, is transmitted mainly among those who inject drugs. In other words, AIDS is transmitted completely differently. Those people account for over 60 per cent. of all those who are HIV-positive in Scotland. However, in England and Wales, 97 per cent. of HIV carriers are men who have contracted the disease from sexual contact. In Africa, most HIV infection is transmitted heterosexually and almost as many women as men are sufferers.

Unfortunately, women will account for an increasing proportion of the total number of AIDS and HIV cases in Britain. I must add that it is also unfortunate for men. Already one third of the HIV-positive drug injecters in Scotland are women. In that context I was worried to read the Office of Health Economics' booklet which forecast the AIDS virus. It showed rising intravenous drug abuse among young women. Their number increased by more than a third between 1982 and 1984. The problem is further compounded by the necessity of many drug addicts to turn to prostitution to finance the habit. In heterosexual intercourse, women are more likely to get AIDS from a man than to give it to a man.

Pregnancy throws up a twofold problem for mother and baby. At present we are not sure why some people with HIV develop AIDS and others do not. It has something to do with the state of a person's health and especially with the state of the immune system. The immense suppression of the immune system during pregnancy almost certainly increases the chances of an HIV mother developing AIDS.

The other side of the coin is the danger to the foetus. The virus can be transmitted to the foetus through the mother's blood or to the baby through her milk. Statistics show that there is a 50:50 chance of an HIV mother giving birth to an HIV child. Clearly, that raises all sorts of issues, ranging from the need for better advice, contraception and abortion facilities to much more freely available screening for those wishing to have a baby and the use of condoms to prevent cervical cancer.

The hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) touched on the question of confidentiality. Bisexual and heterosexual men and women who have more than one partner will clearly be at risk from the disease. We must think with the greatest care how, without breaking confidentiality, we can try to counsel people that they must tell each other, and that they do not have to risk passing on the virus simply because they have more than one partner. They are placed in a dilemma. It will need careful thought to determine how that counselling may be done without breaking confidentiality, or, indeed, breaking a relationship between a man and a woman.

Mr. Rowe: Does the hon. Lady also not agree—she made this extremely important point—that the ease with which it will be possible to counsel people to share this information will depend substantially on the progress that we manage to make in preventing the community from stigmatising people who are known to carry the virus?

Ms. Richards: Absolutely. We have made a small amount of progress in that respect, but it is only small. There is beginning to be a slight change of attitude in the public mind. There will be phases. In the first phase, they do not wish to know; in the second phase they do not wish to have anything to do with anybody who has had anything to do with it; in the third phase they do not come to terms with it. It will be difficult for anybody to come to terms with the problem in that sense. We must develop our attitudes and work out carefully and closely how we do it. Certainly, we must not allow people who are unfortunate enough to contract the disease to be stigmatised in any way.

Having made those few remarks and having pointed to some of the problems that are not tackled by the Bill, I welcome my hon. Friend's attempt to make some progress. I do not suggest that the problems that I have outlined are suitable to be included in a private Member's Bill. My hon. Friend's Bill will pave the way for proper statistical information to be collected on an even basis throughout the country to give us, the Government and society a much clearer idea of what is happening and of what can perhaps be done in the future to help in this dreadful situation.

1.7 pm

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): When we last debated the AIDS problem, I commented on the high level of the debate, the seriousness with which it was treated and the universal acceptance of the problem, with no party differences expressed. Already, we have had the same experience today. This is not a party matter; it is a serious national problem. After considering the Bill, I decided that it was necessary. I congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on having brought it before the House as a private Member's Bill.

It is rather odd that a problem as serious as AIDS—a new disease spreading in this country and in the rest of the world—should be tackled by a private Member's Bill. I hasten to say to my hon. Friend the Minister that this is no criticism of the Government. It represents many hon. Member's awareness of the seriousness of the matter. We all wish to do something about it.

In health debates, it is proper that I declare that I have an interest. I am a member of the Medical Research Council and a director of a pharmaceutical company. I do not seek to draw on any of that expertise, as I did when I spoke in the last AIDS debate. I wish to speak to the Bill. The Bill is not so much about whether sufficient research has been carried out to find a cure or a vaccine for HIV —for AIDS—as about work in health authorities, social services, in voluntary bodies, in the home and in society. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the fact that he has brought forward the important point that we need to tackle the problem and obtain information about it.

[Mr. David Crouch]

Why is the Bill necessary? We are facing the beginning of an epidemic. We need more information so that we can properly assess the scale of the problem and find out where it is concentrated, where it is developing and where the danger spots are. Hon Members have said that the disease is developing in some areas—for example, among drug users in Edinburgh — but is spreading more rapidly among the gay community in London. We need to determine where the growth points are and the cause of the growth. We need to find out where the disease might spread.

We do not have as much experience of this disease as we do of others. We do not need to have a special debate if there is an outbreak of diseases known to the World Health Organisation, the Department of Health and Social Security and the Government. There are set plans for coping with those diseases and they are immediately put into action. With this disease, we are at the beginning of an epidemic and we do not know enough. The Bill will help us to find out much more.

Mr. Mikardo: I am very interested in what the hon. Gentleman is saying about the value of obtaining information about what is happening with AIDS. Perhaps it would be worth considering in Committee whether the statistics that are requested under paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) should be subdivided according to sex, age, drug use and—although I am a little more doubtful about this—marital status.

Mr. Crouch: If we were considering an illness and we knew its varieties and degrees, there might have been a series of schedules to the Bill prescribing the categories to which the hon. Gentleman referred, so that they were all considered in detail. Bills with nothing to do with health contain schedule after schedule which dot every i and cross every t. I am sure that that point can be picked up in Committee.

This is a time for planning, not for panic. We can only plan and mobilise our resources — money, medical resources and social and voluntary work—if we know what we are up against. Those plans must be approved by Parliament, so we have a Bill. It is right that we should have legislation.

We must ensure that the right actions and the right amount of action are taken to prevent the spread of the disease—for example, by education and by advertising, which in a way resulted from our previous debate, not only in its present form on television and radio and in the press but by seminars for those in danger, such as drug users and young people. We must talk in the right areas in the right language. We must go out into the field with the right people to communicate, not preach—in other words, to educate.

We must take the right action in not only medical but caring treatment. Are we sure yet that we know enough about how to care for AIDS sufferers? My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) properly referred to the need not to stigmatise people who suffer from that disease. Why should we stigmatise anyone for any disease, no matter how they have caught it? To suffer from that disease is to suffer from a physical ailment and to suffer shame, remorse and regret. Those people need care and concern from those who look after them. They need not only medical care but care in the sense that I am trying to describe.

In terms of the resources we are considering, we shall need to find not only hospital beds but hospice beds, facilities for treatment at home, out-patient care, training of social workers and encouragement of the voluntary bodies, some of which already exist. I pay tribute to the Terrence Higgins Trust, which has achieved miracles in its work so far on a minimum budget. It is helped, of course, by the Government and I congratulate the Government on that. The trust has achieved a great deal but we need more of such knowledgeable, voluntary and helpful work.

Ms. Richardson: I have followed the hon. Gentleman's arguments carefully. I agree with the tribute he paid—to which I add my own voice—to the voluntary bodies, but we must balance their contributions with care in the community into which money is put by local authorities, or the district health authorities. I would hate to think —I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is not implying—that the voluntary agencies could become in caring terms the substitute for the resources that should be put in by the Government or local authorities.

Mr. Crouch: I did not mean to imply that. I did not wish to neglect to refer to the great work already done in the first few years of this epidemic by the voluntary bodies.

I shall continue to develop my point that the data we seek to collect by this Bill to produce action must result in a combination of Government action through the health authorities and the social service departments and embrace the voluntary work in the hospice and counselling movements.

Ms. Richardson: Or just in the families.

Mr. Crouch: And in the family. I was going to mention that that was another important area where we want to ensure that we have enough resources for counselling as well as just for caring for sufferers and providing medical help to those who are in the final stages of the illness. Counselling is needed much earlier. Counselling is necessary when someone asks to be screened and then learns that he carries the HIV virus. Such a person urgently needs well trained counselling.

That is a serious dilemma. Such people have volunteered to come forward and find to their dismay that they are carrying the virus. At that stage, they will need to be counselled and trained people will be needed to do it. We need to be sure from Government and from the Department that an understanding of how that counselling should be done is passed on regionally and in districts so that it becomes a specialisation and a professional approach is adopted to a serious matter. We must ensure that we do not neglect that.

In the Bill we call for support for the health authorities. They are always under pressure for money, as we have heard endlessly during health debates, but now they are under pressure for yet more money to be spent on providing adequate medical provision in hospitals—out-patient treatment and other hospital departments. The general practitioners may need much more training on AIDS. Hospital authorities must consider whether they can provide the beds, the trained persons and all the other facilities that are necessary. They will have to train their staff in the special preventive measures that are necessary in treating AIDS patients so that the staff can treat them with confidence and not feel fearful of doing so. All this requires a great deal of attention from the centre, and it is so proper that we are reminding the Government today of that need.

We should be calling on all social service departments to consider their approach to the problem. As the House knows, I served for 15 years on the South East Thames health authority, and in October 1986 I received a copy of "The Fight against AIDS". Action has been taken by that health authority. The document is extremely good and I cannot fault it. It is a complete study of the problem that we are considering. The only omission is a recommendation that there should be an annual report, but there is a requirement that all the districts under the authority should consider the problems. All the issues that have to be considered are listed, but there is no call for an anual report. That is a minor omission, because such a report would come forward in the normal course of events: all districts have to report to their regions and the regions report to the Secretary of State.

I am glad to report that one region with which I am familiar—it covers my constituency—has already taken action. I imagine that similar reports have come forward already from all the regions. I should like an assurance from my hon. Friend the Minister for Health when he intervenes that there has been a similarly good response from health authorities generally in facing the problem.

I have mentioned the important work of the social services and have said that they should study the problem that is presented by AIDS. I have mentioned also the voluntary bodies. It is clear that co-ordination is important. We shall receive information and we shall have a measure of the danger of a spreading epidemic. We shall have a measure also of our resources, and information will be provided by the various statutory bodies on the danger that is coming forward, but we shall need to co-ordinate. There must be co-ordination between health and social services, voluntary bodies and the Departments. There is a case for the Government to set up a war cabinet or a crisis centre.

I remind my hon. Friend the Minister of a proposal that was made in a paper that was sent to him recently by a friend of mine, the former director of social services in Kent, Mr. Nicholas Stacey. The paper is not confidential and it contains the proposal that there should be a national AIDS council. I have read the paper and have studied it carefully, and I believe there is much to commend the idea of establishing such a council. The council should be a blend of health workers, health officials, social service officials, voluntary officials and others. I do not have in mind a council of Cabinet Ministers. The council should have the authority to call on the resources that are required and ensure that they are deployed on a district and regional basis to meet the task of fighting a spreading disease.

There is a tendency already to preach about AIDS, and it is one which I condemn. That is not the way to face the danger of a health war. Our problem is to beat the danger. There is a tendency also to think, "I'm all right, Jack." That is something to which the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) referred. Another tendency is to think, "It's not for me, so I do not need to bother." Finally, there is a tendency to think that AIDS will go away, that people will change their habits or even, after the current advertising campaign, stick to one partner and use a condom. It is thought by some that drug users will use only clean needles and not share them. It is argued that that will take care of the problem, and that if they do not follow those practices it is their lookout. That is not the way to consider this problem. however, if they do not, AIDS sufferers will be like so many other people who do not take advice—those who continue to smoke cigarettes when the Government have advised them not to, those who do not use their seat belts against Government law. One cannot stop the rugged individualism of the British or indeed any people.

We must approach the problem and deal with this epidemic by taking note of what is in the Bill. We must get the facts and the figures and marshal our resources in a proper way. In this country we are in danger of whistling in the dark. The Government have taken action through advertising—that I commend—but we must not think that that is enough.

I wonder what the Secretary of State thinks after his recent and I am sure revealing visit to San Francisco. I would like to know his feelings about the importance of care in the community — I am sure that that was revealed to him in San Francisco where such community care, as opposed to hospital treatment, is important. How many days does an AIDS victim stay in hospital in San Francisco? I understand that many AIDS sufferers stay in hospital in San Francisco for only 11 days but that in New York they stay for 65 days. Why is there such a difference? Is there no co-ordination of treatment patterns in the United States? The average length of stay in St Thomas's or in the Middlesex hospital is between 17 and 18 days. That does not mean that that is the end of the treatment for the AIDS sufferer; it means that hospitalisation is not the only answer. Clearly, community care has an important part to play and we need to know Government views on developing that care.

To control this epidemic, we must remove the danger, assemble the facts and be aware of the size of the problem. In New York, for example, 30 per cent. of new AIDS cases are intravenous drug users and there are not so many from the gay community, but again the situation is different in San Francisco.

The proper strategy to prevent the spread of AIDS should be based on education and advertising. However, it is important that Government advertising must appear to be an important message and not, as it was delivered to me, wrapped up with a lot of junk mail on double glazing. That was the Post Office's fault and I have written to the Minister to draw his attention to that problem. A number of my constituents were delivered this important pamphlet wrapped up in an elastic band with double glazing advertisements, direct mail advertisements and so on. That was done by the Post Office and it was a great pity. The AIDS message is important and we must try to avoid mixing it up with the wrong sort of advertising.

We want, by correct personal and medical practices, to prevent the spread of AIDS. Here I come to a contentious issue. We must not neglect the question of blood transfusions. Recently there has been an argument between the British Medical Association and the Department about this matter. It is understandable that there should be an argument, because once two or three medical men are gathered together there will be two or three different views. In the end, the problem was sorted out and the Department and the BMA issued a joint statement.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Tony Newton): I hesitate to interrupt but I wish to make it absolutely clear that it was not simply an argument between the BMA and the Government — there was a good deal of disagreement within the BMA and it is important that that should be understood.

Mr. Crouch: I entirely agree. I have read the report of that BMA meeting and Sir Christopher Booth, president of the BMA, utterly condemned the scare caused by the statement issued by one speaker.

I raise the question of blood transfusions only because I think that we ought to consider what is called autologous blood transfusion. In the British Medical Journal there is a leading article on the need for autologous blood transfusion.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West) rose——

Mr. Crouch: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not allow him to intervene at this stage. Before he does so, I should like to read what is said in this article, which appeared in the British Medical Journal on Saturday 17 January 1987.

Referring to the discussion on blood transfusion the article says:

"It will also encourage further consideration of collecting the patient's own blood before an elective operation and then transfusing it into him during the operation if necessary".

Then there is a quotation from a report by the Public Health Laboratory Service communicable disease surveillance centre. It says:

"Although all blood donations in developed countries are now tested for antibodies to HIV, concern remains that some donations may transmit the virus.

Having acquired the virus, a person may take three to six months to develop the marker antibody, and the virus's remarkable capacity for antigenic change may make the antibodies evoked undetectable by conventional testing."

The article then says:

"As the virus spreads into the general hetrosexual community, asking male homosexuals, drug addicts, prostitutes, and their partners to refrain from donation becomes less helpful, as even the traditionally safe volunteer donor may be affected. So far, 65 positive donations have been detected in Britain."

It is no good ducking facts. The article then says:

"Autologous transfusion eliminates these risks of serious infection and also avoids sensitisation to red cell, white cell, and platelet antigens in donor blood".

Autologous blood transfusions are not accepted in many parts of the medical profession. The article also says:

"Autologous transfusion programmes have been used successfully in orthopaedic surgery, including paediatric cases, cardiothoracic and general surgery, and urological and head and neck surgery. It has also been used for women undergoing caesarian section. As many as 55 per cent. of elective surgical operations could be performed using autologous blood—that is, about a quarter of all surgical operations."

I read that article with interest. It should prompt further consideration of the use of a persons's own blood in transfusions where that is thought medically possible and is agreed by the patient.

We must care for AIDS patients in hospitals, in hospices, at home and in society. If we can marshal our resources and ensure that they are used correctly, and if we do not neglect the enormous importance of social care, we shall go a long way towards overcoming this problem. The epidemic must be conquered by these means. We must pull out every stop in international medical research to find the vaccine to bring that about.

1.33 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) for choosing this subject for his private Member's Bill. The contributions to the debate so far show how welcome is his initiative. We are all aware that the city of Edinburgh needs particular attention and help to deal with what the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) described as an aspect of the AIDS problem that is peculiar to Edinburgh because of its size and expansiveness. It is a commonly known fact that Edinburgh, probably more than any other United Kingdom city, suffers from drug-related AIDS.

I was not in the House on 21 November, nine weeks ago today, when the House spent the whole of a Friday debating AIDS. It was clear from the reports and from Hansard that that was a highly responsible and well respected and reported debate which demonstrated the general concern for urgent action.

In the nine weeks between the debate on 21 November and today, statistics—which appear to be accepted—show that over 3,000 additional people will have been infected with the virus. It is that sort of statistic that should reach home to people up and down the land. It is the sort of statistic that was rightly quoted and publicised by the Secretary of State at the beginning of the month when he introduced his publicity campaign, warning people, as he is bound to do, that about 4,000 people in Britain will die of AIDS in the next three years. The Institute of Medical Laboratory Sciences says that the number of cases of those infected with the virus is likely to double every 10 months.

Every opportunity must be taken to warn, advise, inform and assist people. Therefore, it is entirely appropriate that soon after that general debate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East has introduced his Bill, which, I expect, will receive its Second Reading today, go into Committee and soon be law. The hon. Gentleman intends that the first report of each district health authoity and board will be forthcoming in a year's time from now, with exactly the sort of information that each health authority should be seeking and providing.

Today's debate is also appropriate because of all the parallel events connected with AIDS that have been striking the public consciousness this week. The advertising campaign is well under way on the hoardings, and in the past few days the public have received—mine arrived a couple of days ago — the leaflet from the Department of Health that was published for each household. I say to the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) that my leaflet arrived separately from the rest of the post, and I agree that it is important that the leaflet is brought to the attention of people.

It may be that another leaflet will be required quite soon particularly for places such as London, where there are many people in multiple occupancy dwellings and other housing, who are difficult to reach with any literature. We have seen the advertising posters and leaflets, the launch of the Government's publicity campaign and the welcome visit of the Secretary of State to the United States, which has been well reported in Britain. The initiatives there will help considerably to show the Minister and his Department what they should be doing, and television coverage of the visit will make even more people aware of the issue.

We have seen the opening of the first AIDS wards in London, with the welcome blessing and endorsement by the royal family and others. The Middlesex hospital has added to the clear lead which it, with St. Mary's and St. Stephen's hospitals, has given. They are determined to break through the prejudices and show that they have a duty to treat, support and help people who are victims of this illness. At 11.30 this morning BBC Radio 4's "International Assignment" programme was dedicated to reporting the comparative figures on AIDS as it affects the different continents, not just ourselves.

In spite of all these opportunities, as other Members have made clear, the message does not necessarily reach home, and I say that with an admission. Ten days ago, or thereabouts, I was appointed to the job of spokesman on health for the alliance parties. In all honesty, I had not until then addressed myself in detail to the issue of AIDS in the way that I now have to do. I am sure that there are many like myself, who are not entirely unintelligent and who are fairly aware of what is going on, but who do not think that they need to be particularly informed about AIDS. They see the advertisements, register the problem, are aware of the clichéd responses and then say, "But it is not affecting me."

Most people in Britain, like me, will not yet know of anybody who is carrying the virus or dying from the disease. I am not aware of anybody whom I know within either of those categories, and most people would be in the same position. Therefore, one feels protected. Much more work needs to be done.

The clear horror of the disease is that it strikes down the healthiest people in the prime of life. It is most likely to affect not the elderly but the relatively young or the young middle-aged. Therefore, we must think about how we can do much more.

One person in a thousand in Britain is now estimated to be a carrier of the virus. That is at least one or two Members of the two Houses of Parliament, let alone the staff and all who visit. Such statistics need to register with people so that they begin to think that the disease does affect them and they must respond.

As the Secretary of State rightly said, public information is the only vaccine that we have. We must think of ways in which to make that the most effective vaccine. I congratulate the Government on what they have done. Once they got off the mark they responded, and quickly. I am prepared to accept that they may now be accelerating in the outside lane compared with other countries and their Governments. I applaud that and I encourage them to do more—to allow health authorities to spend the money necessary and to support the voluntary agencies which are doing, and are willing to do, the work.

The Department's initiatives are welcome and are complemented by the proposals in the Bill that the health authorities should do the same, which is equally welcome. I am in the same regional health authority area as the hon. Member for Canterbury and the consultative and later final document produced by the South-East Thames regional health authority is excellent. I think that it was produced in advance of that of any other region, but I stand to be corrected on that. That is exactly the sort of work that needs to be done urgently. There should be a set of recommendations that can then be implemented and monitored. I congratulate my regional health authority, as I have done in writing long before today's debate.

Clearly, the Bill is welcome, not only because it will enable and require that that be done, but because, as the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) rightly said, it will look at the other side of the coin, which is the need to be informed about what we are doing to care for the victims. There are horrendous phsychological problems for someone confronted with the diagnosis that he or she is a carrier. The hospice movement is not yet geared to cater for AIDS victims, but it could be, and is willing to be. People in the medical profession are willing to do a lot of work and to adapt their own professional careers to respond because their duty is one of service.

The double responsibility for information and medical knowledge—facts and figures—and to ensure that we have a network of care, is contained in the Bill. It is supported by both sides of the House and by my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), who has been much involved in this issue over recent months.

I should like at this point briefly to pay tribute to my hon. Friend. When someone is reshuffled and disappears to take a different parliamentary responsibility overnight, he has to take up his new responsibilities and not continue with what he was doing. Up to 21 November 1986 my hon. Friend had asked more than 50 parliamentary questions on AIDS. That is five times more—I do not say this in criticism, but just to enhance my hon. Friend's reputation—than the Labour Front Bench asked over the same period. He clearly led the campaign for information in the House, quite properly and responsibly. I pay tribute to his foresight and keenness, which perhaps has something to do with his constituency being near to Edinburgh on the one hand and being a pharmacist on the other. He also had two very good and committed research assistants, who made sure that he was always up to the mark.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): One of the things that the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) did not do was to try to score petty party points about who had asked the most parliamentary questions. He tried to approach the topic in a multi-partisan spirit. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that a solution to the problem is to ask more questions than any other hon. Member, he is sadly mistaken and is setting the limits far too low.

Mr. Hughes: I shall come back to that in a moment. I am more concerned about some of the answers that the Minister has not given us than about the questions. I shall not let him off the hook, and hope that he will be able to enlighten us shortly.

Those of us in political parties also have a responsibility to make sure that our parties address the AIDS issue and commit, through our membership, the political emphasis to make sure that necessary work is done in community health councils, district health authorities and so on. I am glad to say that at my party's council meeting in Bristol in November last year we did just that. I think I am right in saying that we became the first party to adopt a widespread and far-reaching policy on this subject.

[Mr. Hughes]

Finally, I should like to ask the Minister some questions about what is being done. As I have suggested, there may need to be additional money for certain of the voluntary organisations. Will it be found?

I understand that the needle exchange scheme which operates in 12 cities is still a pilot scheme. I do not know what will be required to take it from being a pilot scheme to being a scheme available wherever it is wanted locally. However, I hope that if there is any local pressure for the scheme to be available in any other town, city or health authority area, the Department will permit that. I am entirely persuaded that it is right to have a one-for-one needle exchange scheme, and we should not moralise about that. It is better that we deal first with getting rid of the infected needle and separately start trying to deal with the drugs problem that faces those people.

I have seen the television advertisement only once, but I must advise the Minister that I am not certain that it is as effective as the literature, for those who read the literature. When I saw the television advert my reaction was that it generates fear and does not convey much information. That is a mistake. I understand the desire to make sure that people register that the advert is there. However, what people desperately need is information.

At the end of the last year I went to speak to a London sixth form. After lunch some of the sixth form students came back to the House to watch a debate from the Gallery. Four or five of them drove back with me and between them AIDS came up as a topic of conversation — sexual topics are often likely to be topics of conversation among teenagers——

Mr. Tony Banks: And among older people.

Mr. Hughes: Indeed. It was a very clichéd conversation —AIDS, reaction, condoms. The conversation was not developed intelligently.

It led me to fear that the advertising campaign is doing two things. First, it is over-simplifying the message, which may be necessary in the first stage, but we should go beyond that. Secondly, it is likely to generate fear rather than information. The Family Planning Association has written to me and, I imagine, to other hon. Members. If one is to discuss how condoms can be helpful, it is important to stress how to use them effectively. The FPA has given me to understand that a badly used condom will be inadequate and that not all condoms are up to the task. That information is important, especially to youngsters, many of whom will have sexual relationships at an early stage.

It is also important to tell people, and to reassure them about how they will not contract AIDS, otherwise the minority groups, which are likely to be the most frequent victims, are likely to suffer from greater isolation and being spurned by others, and alienation will result.

The other day the Secretary of State went to visit and meet AIDS victims in the States. He did what my predecessor, as Liberal party health spokesman my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire did here in London in the autumn, when he went to visit someone at St. Mary's hospital. The AIDS patient whom my hon. Friend met was resigned to his position. He was not bitter. He knew that he would die in a year's time. He was full of praise for his medical treatment and had been able to have a reconciliation with his brother. However —and the hon. Member for Mid-Kent made this exact point—the one thing that he was frightened of was the reaction of the community when he went home. He had a great fear of being taken home and regarded as a leper in the community. The myth that the handshake, the contact, the hug or even nearness to someone is sufficient for a person to contract AIDS has to be one of the main targets of the Government's information activities. It appears still to be a mythology, but it is the most dangerous and hurtful mythology for the victim——

Mr. Mikardo: Fostered by some newspapers.

Mr. Hughes: And indeed it is fostered by many newspapers on a regular basis. I do not know whether the Department has done so, but it could call in the newspaper editors and tell them to get their facts right. That would be helpful. We should see whether they responded.

My hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire and the hon. Members for Gower (Mr. Wardell) and for Islington, South and Finsbury, (Mr. Smith) tabled questions in October, before the end of the previous Session, seeking information on, for example, whether regional health authorities had forwarded circulars and plans, the number of victims so far, and what funds had been allocated. I understand that the Minister has not replied to those questions. I am not blaming him personally, but no letter has been received. The only answer received was:

"I shall write to the hon. Members."—[Official Report, 6 November 1986; Vol. 103, c. 578.]

No letter has been received — and I checked this morning. That is just the sort of information that is required and it is why the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East has introduced his Bill and asked for important information. Even now we need the information that is in the Government's hands. We need to know which health authorities have taken initiatives and made progress.

I fully support the Bill. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East for introducing it. I am sure that it will receive its Second Reading today, but it is only the second step in a campaign that still entails much hard work if most people are to understand the severity of the message and of the need for their personal response before it is too late.

1.52 pm

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): It is good to hear the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) congratulating the Government on their response to this new disease and public concern about it. Those congratulations are well merited because, after all, the Government have committed substantial resources to dealing with the problem.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned briefing newspapers. My impression is that a good deal of that has been done with some success. Not all the newspaper articles have been as helpful and accurate as others, but there has been a good deal of press publicity. The Government have reconstituted the Health Education Council as a special health authority and have embarked on a massive publicity campaign. The leaflet is very good in that it was intended for general distribution. It trod carefully the difficult line between giving explicit information and not causing offence. I hope that in due course other leaflets will be available, perhaps in different styles and directed to particular audiences.

I have my reservations about the television advertisement. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey may have misunderstood its intention, which I believe was simply to draw attention to the leaflet, and not to give information, but I am not sure that it was successful in doing that. It drew attention to volcanoes, but it was seeking to draw attention to the leaflet itself, not the envelope in which it arrived. For the reasons given by my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch), the most important thing would have been to do that.

Issuing the leaflet was certainly a good first step. Because there is no known cure for AIDS, the first priority must be education and the second must be the identification and care of the victims. On both those matters there is obviously a limit to what the Government can do and responsibility moves to the district health authorities. That is why I welcome the Bill and congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on his intiative in drawing it up and presenting it to the House. As the hon. Gentleman said, it will give the health authorities that extra incentive to do what many are doing already and to provide the Department with vital information.

If I have any reservations about the Bill it is that I would put a question mark over clause 1(2)(f). I wonder whether it is practical for a health authority to give estimates of the number of people in other words, those likely to contract AIDS. The figures can be only estimates and, as we know, in Britain and in America the estimates vary wildly and can only be the result of guesswork because there are so many imponderables and because we know so little about the way in which the disease develops. I wonder whether it is reasonable to expect district health authorities to put into an official report figures that could not be supported. Some may be able to draw conclusions from current figures, but I am not sure that district health authorities should put estimates of that sort into what would be a statutory document.

"who are likely to fall within each of the paragraphs . . . above"—

We had a full debate on AIDS in November, to which I made a brief contribution. I do not intend to go into detail now about this serious and complex subject. I must stress, however, that although there is currently no known cure for AIDS it is not true, as has been said in some quarters, that little is being done to find one. The Government have made an additional £1 million available for research, over and above the 21 projects already under way at a cost of some £2·4 million. Several drug companies —I have a local interest in Burroughs Wellcome—are devoting substantial resources to research into AIDS, often at the expense of work on possible cures for diseases that are currently causing more deaths and suffering than AIDS. Any drug company that could prodice a cure would be doing not only an enormous service to the community but would benefit financially. There is no doubt that the drug companies are working hard to try to find a vaccine or a cure. However, I fear that it will be a long time before we can be sure that we have found such a cure. Even if the companies appear to be having successes it is important that the drugs are properly tested because, in recent memory, there have been cases of drugs coming on to the market that have been found to have unfortunate side effects.

One is not being part of any campaign against homosexuals by pointing out that at present in the United Kingdom AIDS is primarily a homosexual disease. Of the 610 patients up to the end of 1986, 538 were male homosexuals or bisexuals. Of the 293 deaths, 244 were in that category. Therefore, I suggest that there is a special responsibility on homosexuals as to how they behave among themselves and the extent to which they seek to interest and involve others, especially the young, in homosexual activity.

Discussion often centres on whether this is a moral issue and whether Ministers and others should be moralising. I am sure that Ministers should not be moralising and I am not sure whether chief constables should, but sometimes I should like to see more members of the clergy moralising, especially on issues such as this. However, when one hears of clergymen calling themselves "gay Christians" it is a little difficult to know in which direction they are going.

I suggest that this is a moral issue because when we talk of morals we are referring to a code of personal conduct and the way in which we conduct our personal relationships with other people, whether that is based on a religious ethic or not. That is surely what morals are all about. Therefore, AIDS should be taken into account in our personal moral codes, particularly with regard to the homosexual community. It is very important that all of us, and especially the homosexual community, realise the implicatons of AIDS, how it can be caught and what can follow from it.

I return to the point, therefore, that we must have as much information as possible and that that information should be conveyed to as many people as possible. Although the Government and the DHSS have a great responsibility, a great deal of responsibility rests with the district health authorities in this matter. In that connection, I return to the Bill which, as the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East said in his opening remarks, should serve to galvanise district health authorities into action. I hope that it will do just that. I warmly support the Bill and wish it well.

2 pm

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): We know that a system of voluntary reporting of cases on a confidential basis to the communicable disease surveillance centre has been established. However, last October the Minister stated that no decision had been made to go beyond that.

The Bill goes beyond that and will put our knowledge about the spread of AIDS on a quantifiable basis. Some of the information is already being obtained and there should be no insuperable difficulty about health authorities and health boards instituting the administrative procedures necessary to gather and collate information.

To increase the accuracy of the statistics, but I realise primarily to help stop the spread of the disease, voluntary screening should also be made available on a totally confidential basis. Information can no doubt be gathered from VD clinics, counselling centres and other sources within the districts or region of any health board. I emphasise that it is important to obtain that information confidentially and it is important to demonstrate to those at risk that confidentiality will be observed.

In due course, the Bill will enable us to verify the scope of the problem and whether it is being appreciated properly. It will also help us to decide whether estimates made some years ago were accurate. If they are not, they will be shown to be inaccurate much earlier than if the Bill had not been enacted. If our predictions or the Government's predictions are seen as not being fulfilled, early reappraisal will be possible.

The Opposition also believe that the Bill is important because it will provide some check on whether the Government's advertising is having an effect. Many comments are being passed throughout the country and even in the Tea Rooms of the House of Commons about the efficacy or otherwise of the advertising campaign. However, we will be able to decide whether the Government are spending their money wisely in their advertising campaign only if the information is available.

There are many ways to solve a problem. One is to chuck money at it. However, resources are too precious to be frittered away, and the Bill will enable us to check that resources are not being wasted. I am not arguing that resources should not be deployed. I am merely asking for wise and sensible deployment. Unfortunately, this Government too often use that argument for not spending any money at all. If they were to adopt that policy with regard to the containment of AIDS, it would be disastrous.

The effects of the Bill will also help to counter ignorance, the spread of alarm and scaremongering. There is no substitute for accurate information as a means of making the public aware of the scale of the problem. We should be seeking the public's help and generating a responsible attitude throughout society.

Mr. Tony Banks: Would my hon. Friend care to comment on the fact that the Government are spending about £20 million on an advertising campaign yet it appears from the figures that they are spending only about £3·5 million on research into a cure for AIDS? Is that not a rather strange scale of priorities?

Dr. Marek: My hon. Friend is right and I shall make some comments on research later. If the Government do not want a bipartisan approach to the problem, the Opposition are willing to co-operate, but they must take the comments of Opposition Members and concerned people seriously and ensure that resources are not taken away from AIDS research, advertising and education simply because they do not want to spend money and this is a case in which they need not spend it.

The Bill will ensure that much better information on carriers becomes available. Officially, there are 30,000 carriers, but some put the figure at 100,000. That may be alarmist, and if the Bill is passed, we shall have a better appreciation of how many carriers there are. More information will become available as to how the disease is transmitted. We are continually learning about it, but the Bill will help that process. Our knowledge is growing, but a whole population study will be invaluable as a means of control and observation of the incidence of the disease and its eventual eradication. The title of the Bill is "AIDS (Control) Etc. Bill." I wish that we could interpret "Control" as eradication, but, unfortunately, it must rather be interpreted as observation and monitoring. Sadly, at present there is no cure.

If the Bill is given a Second Reading today, and I hope that it will, perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East will go further and ask the Government what provision they are making. Would it be possible for the Government to prepare an annual report from these district and health board reports? If they were to produce an annual report, they could say what funds were being applied where, what research projects were being undertaken, what we were learning from other countries and what we were doing to develop counselling and education.

We must face the problem of confidentiality versus availability of information. In some areas the number of people registered as carrying the AIDS virus could be as low as one, two or three. If there were a problem of identification caused by the statistics, clearly confidentiality must take priority. However, that is not an excuse for the Government to say, "We cannot release any information." The Government are obliged to provide as detailed information as possible, subject only to the overriding criterion of maintaining confidentiality.

If the Government prepare a report, they could give the basis for the distribution of resources and we could check that the resources were being properly targeted. The Bill is not an excuse for the Government to do nothing until information from the reports starts to come in.

This is an example of where additional income is required by the National Health Service. AIDS was unknown less than a decade ago; it has come upon us in the past four years. The Government are fond of saying that the growth in the NHS budget has been 24 per cent. above the rate of inflation, but that does not take account of the medical retail price index, medical advances and operations that we can do now but could not do five years ago. The figure does not take into account the effects of greatly increased unemployment and the increased resources that must be employed as a result. Nor does it take into account the fact that we have an increasingly aging population. AIDS is yet another reason why that 24 per cent. is not all that it seems to be. AIDS requires additional expenditure.

The Opposition, together with the Government, consider that this is an important issue. We should like a bipartisan approach. It is only as a united country that we can tackle this dreadful disease. For a bipartisan approach we need to be convinced that the Government not only are taking the issues seriously—I believe they are—but are putting the resources into the right places to back up their concern. In particular, it is not acceptable for the Secretary of State for the Environment, in reply to a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 12 January this year, to say that it was for local authorities to assess their own priorities for expenditure. My hon. Friend had asked the Secretary of State what advice he gave local councils on the priority to be attached to spending money on local campaigns to warn people of the dangers of AIDS.

Of course, we all know that in many ways local authorities are strapped for cash and cannot have the freedom to take the measures that they consider they should take to educate people about the dangers of AIDS.

Mr. Tony Banks: My hon. Friend had made a good point. The London borough of Newham is trying to run an imaginative series of schemes to educate people—its staff and members of the public generally—about the problem of AIDS. The borough is faced with a 10 per cent. cut in the resources that it is to get from the Government. How can a borough such as Newham manage to equate the two positions?

Dr. Marek: My hon. Friend has made a good point. I know that he will try to make a contribution to the debate later. I hope that he will forgive me—I agree with him completely—if I do not comment any further.

The money being spent on research is not sufficient. Again, in a written reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) on 16 January the Minister said that the amounts of money being listed were not by any means large enough.

As was pointed out earlier, the Opposition wish to see the Government earnestly address themselves to research and to committing resources to it. If the Minister—I think he said this a few months ago—still maintains that all worthwhile projects are being funded, I should like him to say so again now. I should like that fact to be known publicly. It would be valuable to know of any research projects in this country, or perhaps in other countries so that we can tackle this disease, and the money should be available. It should be available as an extra. NHS patients who have a broken leg, who require a by-pass operation, or who have cancer, do not want to be told, "Sorry, you cannot come in for your operation because the money is required for AIDS. We do not know when we can have you in, but you may come in at a later time." Money for AIDS research must be provided over and above any other provision for the National Health Service.

This is an important subject. I do not wish to conclude my remarks—many more important points still must be made—but other hon. Members and the Minister wish to speak. The Bill is supported by informed and responsible opinion. It is supported by the British Medical Association and, to my knowledge, all the bodies that are concerned with AIDS and its treatment. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East on bring forward this Bill. I ask the House to give it a Second Reading.

2.13 pm

The Minister for Health (Mr. Tony Newton): I shall rattle away, because the time available is rather short. I wish to make some points about the Bill as well as answer those that have been asked of me during the debate. If my opening words are brief, I hope that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) will not misunderstand it as failing to wish to congratulate him on his luck in the ballot and on bringing forward this measure. I am aware of the importance he attaches to the AIDS problem, and for good reasons, given the nature and scale of the problem in the city of which he represents part.

I say gently to the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) that if the Government were looking for excuses to do nothing, as he suggested towards the end of his speech, I doubt whether I should be standing here in the friendly way in which I am at the moment. We could perfectly easily have thought of endless reasons for not having the Bill and for seeking to prevent it being passed. I am bound to tell the House, if only as a matter of propriety, that, strictly speaking, we do not consider that the Bill is needed. Quite apart from the existing accounting arrangements for reporting within the Health Service, the National Health Service Act 1977 already contains provisions that enable the Secretary of State to direct local authorities to provide him with certain information. Having made those points, I certainly do not intend to use them as reasons for advising the House not to proceed with the Bill.

However, I have some anxieties about the details of the provisions of the Bill as it stands—anxieties which have been echoed by my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims), the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) and, to a responsible degree, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East. There is no doubt that, in our judgment, a number of problems would be created if the Bill were to be enacted in exactly its present form. The most serious of those difficulties is the one on which hon. Members have touched—the threat to the confidentiality of AIDS patients which it could pose in some circumstances.

Although the number of AIDS cases is increasing, the number of patients being treated is relatively small, as several hon. Members have said—only a few hundred—and will remain so for some years. The number will grow but will remain small relative to the instances of many other diseases. That means that in many health authority areas there will be only a handful of AIDS patients. The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo)—who has not made a speech but has made some helpful, or otherwise interventions—wished to have a breakdown of AIDS patients by sex and sexual proclivity and the route by which it was thought that transmission had occurred. Such an analysis would probably be easy in a district that had only one AIDS patient, but it would certainly raise questions as to how far the confidentiality of that patient was being safeguarded.

Leaving aside the Thames regions, no region—let alone district—has more than 13 live AIDS patients. In other words, if the number of cases in each health district is published, there is a risk to the confidentiality of an individual patient. It is vital, as I think everyone accepts, that we should preserve such confidentiality. If we cannot guarantee it, many people will be unwilling to come forward for testing and treatment, and AIDS will be driven underground. This is quite apart from the moral issues which would be raised by breaking confidentiality about a matter of this kind.

Another consequence is that some doctors, to protect their patients, would cease to report cases of AIDS, and the effective national reporting system operated by the communicable disease surveillance centre, to which the hon. Member for Wrexham referred, would be undermined.

The problem of district analysis of antibody-positive patients, which is called for in one subsection, is considerable. At present, we have no central record of in which district such patients reside. The present system of testing and reporting, which I think we all have agreed works well, is not district-based. Some districts do not have laboratories that undertake antibody testing.

Some patients—this is an important point because this probably happens with other sexually transmitted diseases as well—travel on purpose outside their districts for testing and-or diagnosis. Even to collect data on the district from which positive blood samples originated would impose a considerable burden on the people collecting those reports at the CDSC and is likely to produce misleading data. In any case, the number of known antibody-positives in each district is not in itself helpful, in that only a small proportion of those that have been infected have been identified. Projections of how many extra might be identified in the following 12 months would not have a great deal of value for planning purposes, other than to help estimate the additional counselling load.

I must make it clear to the House that we do not believe that it is sensible at present to attempt any local analysis in that degree of detail of cases and of reporting antibody-positives other than at regional level. Interpretation of the data obtained from blood testing requires skills that may not be available in each district. The communicable disease surveillance centre would not have the resources to assist each and every district in attempting its projections. Even at regional level, there are problems in making projections even as far ahead as 12 months. When the numbers are small, the errors involved can be large.

To sum up, although we would not oppose analysis of data at regional level and would see some advantages in doing that, we think it important not to run the risks that I have just sought to describe of jeopardising the present excellent national system at the communicable disease surveillance centre.

In reply to the point made earlier, we have already undertaken to make regular national figures available on the number of AIDS cases on monthly and quaterly bases and to provide a broad analysis including an assessment of the trend, insofar as it can be identified, in the number of HIV positives. That picks up a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James). There is no suggestion that we should make information available about AIDS only once a year. It is appropriate to impose that obligation annually on health authorities.

I shall not attempt to cover all the technical problems in the Bill, some of which are minor but cannot be dismissed. However, I should touch on one of them which is that the Bill imposes some obligations on health authorities with which in practice they probably could not comply. Whatever they sought to do, they could not easily establish exactly what "treatment and counselling" was being provided by "other public or voluntary bodies" as stated in the Bill.

Such bodies cannot be made to supply the relevant information to health authorities which may not even be aware—although we hope that they would be—of all the organisations operating in their area. It would be difficult for a health authority to obtain every detail of the work being carried out by a private clinic. That is not a major problem, but we must keep an eye on it when considering the drafting and the amending which will no doubt need to be considered as the Bill goes into Committee, should the House give it a Second Reading.

Leaving aside pure nit-picking points, something in the Bill is rather ironic and in the circumstances I see it as a defect. Manifestly, the assumption and the wish on both sides of the House has been that that data should be made available by the district health authorities and the regional health authorities to the Secretary of State so that it can be communicated to the public at large. But there is, as I read the Bill, no requirement for the information to be published. The House may wish to consider that, too. The Government are ready to accept the basic purpose of the Bill but has serious reservations about the detail of some of the drafting. I know that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East will understand that.

I must apologise for the fact that I shall have little time to reply to all the points made. However, It would be right to devote a moment or two to them, especially in view of the reference by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) to the information that the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) sought earlier about district facts. I must apologise that there has not yet apparently been a reply to that letter.

I shall give the House a quick rundown on how that matter stands at present. In January 1986, a health circular was issued to regional and district health authorities giving them resource assumptions as the basis for their planning. It requested all districts to develop a plan of action concentrating on high-risk groups, complementing the national publicity campaign and including provision for testing and counselling services and for treating clinical AIDS cases. Those plans were to be submitted by the end of June 1986, and subsequently included in regional short-term programmes.

That advice has been amplified in various ways in the intervening period and on 23 December 1986, the secretary of State wrote to all district health chairmen stressing that he expected the plans to reflect the needs of those parts of the Health Service which would be under additional pressures because of AIDS, especially clinics for sexually transmitted diseases. They were also asked to provide details of their proposals for future years in their short-term plans. That material is now being analysed and I am happy to tell the House that we have received reports from all district health authorities with one possible exception, which tells us that its report is in the post.

Mr. Tony Banks: Like a cheque.

Mr. Newton: I hesitated to make the old joke, with which many hon. Members will be familiar.

The Government's intention—this ties in with the purpose of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East—is that a national picture should be obtained from the reports, from which, among other things, examples of good practice will be identified. Details of the national strategy which emerge, together with a commentary on it and examples of good practice, will be fed back to regional and district authorities and to other bodies with an interest in health care planning.

To my regret, it is hardly possible for me to say much about the many issues that have been raised during the debate. I shall try to respond to one or two of them in the short time that remains. My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) and the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) spoke about the television advertising. The advertisement was intended merely to draw attention to the leaflet in a way which would be dramatic. It has had to compete with all the other things that appear during a television commercial break, and I believe that it has been effective. I think that even the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey will agree with me that a television commercial that attempted to tell people what the risks were, to communicate what are not risks and to tell young people how to use condoms, which was one of his suggestions, would be a television programme and not a commercial.

There is a great deal going on, and the broadcasting authorities have been extremely co-operative. The Government will be seeking to build on the public education campaign and to move on from merely drawing attention to the leaflet to conveying particular messages. I hope that it is clearly understood that the purpose of that which we have done so far is to draw attention to the source of the information, which is the leaflet.

In courtesy to the House and to ensure that I do not inadvertently talk out the Bill, I leave the matter there. I am prepared to advise the House to let the Bill have a Second Reading on the basis that we shall need to do a good deal of work in Committee.

Mr. Strang: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall reply briefly to the debate in the short time that remains.

I am grateful to all those who have participated in the debate. Everyone who has done so has supported the Bill in principle. I am grateful to hon. Members for the manner in which the debate has been conducted. Like the debate which took place on 21 November, it has been an instructive and sensible contribution to the wiser debate that will continue in the country on this issue.

I am sure that it will be understood if I do not refer to individual contributions save to thank the occupants of both Front Benches and the spokesperson of the Liberal party, the hon. Member for Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). I say a special "thank you" to the Minister for Health for the help that he has given. It is fair to acknowledge that we had a constructive exchange during the parliamentary recess. Had it not been for that meeting, I doubt whether I would have reached the stage of being able to introduce a Bill that would have the support of hon. Members on both sides of the House.

The Minister has raised a number of important issues. I acknowledge that confidentiality is important and I respect that point of view. I doubt whether there will be any difficulty about that. The Minister referred to a number of practical matters, including the requirement of statistics. It is important that we cover that area of the Bill in a more pragmatic way. I am sure that there will be no difficulty in doing that should the House give the Bill a Second Reading and enable it to be considered in Committee.

The comments made and issues raised in debating the Bill have been basically supportive. The Bill, however, should not be regarded as being primarily about statistics. It is not.

Mr. Newton indicated assent.

Mr. Strang: The Minister recognises that.

The Bill is directed to an area of activity and I believe that it will make a valuable contribution to resource planning. I accept what the Minister has said about district and regional statistics, and resources will have to be targeted into different areas of the country. I am grateful for the support which has been given to the Bill and I hope that the House will give it a Second Reading.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

Unborn Children (Protection) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read a Second time.—[Mr. Burt.]

2.29 pm

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): I hope that the House will not consent to give a Second Reading to a Bill on the basis of a debate that will last about 35 seconds. The Bill deals with a subject which, as we know from what has happened in past sessions, is highly controversial and there are many strongly held opinions——

It being half past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Friday 20 February.

REGISTER OF SASINES (SCOTLAND) BILL

Read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

SCHOOL GOVERNORS (ACCESS TO INFORMATION) BILL

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 30 January.

DOG FIGHTING (PENALTIES) BILL

Read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

POLICE COMPLAINTS AUTHORITY (INFORMATION) BILL

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day?

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): If that was a Government objection, no fixed day; if it was a Back-Bench objection, Friday next.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 30 January.

Arts Council (Budget)

Motion made, and Question proposed, that this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

2.31 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): This is the third time lucky for me in respect of this subject, because I first attempted to raise the matter of the Arts Council budget on 11 December but abstruse parliamentary procedure at that time conspired against me. There was a point when I thought that I might end up raising Arts Council budget for 1988-89, but I realise that by then we shall have a Labour Government and a Labour Arts Minister with far greater resources at his or her disposal. There will be infinitely more imagination and excitement in our arts policy.

This is the first occasion upon which the matter of the Arts Council budget for 1987-88 has been raised on the Floor of the House other than through parliamentary questions. The Government's original announcement was made on 17 November by the somewhat sneaky method of a planted written answer. There was no statement from the Dispatch Box, when the Minister would have been forced to answer questions from both sides, and no debate has been arranged in Government time since the announcement. I believe this to be cowardly behaviour on the part of the Arts Minister. Perhaps he is afraid to come to the House to justify himself in relation to the Arts Council budget for 1987-88. Thousands of organisations and millions of people in this country are very interested in this annual round of government announcement, Arts Council consideration and decisions and then, of course, the subsequent reactions from the clients who receive the money.

I believe that there are three main reasons why the Minister should be far more forthright in initiating and encouraging broader parliamentary debate on the arts. It is up to him to do this. First, one has to consider the sheer number of people in the country who are genuinely interested in the subject. One can witness to that fact the amount of press interest shown in anything connected with the arts.

Secondly, there is the significance of the arts in our society generally. Socially and economically, the arts are a major factor and it is ridiculous that they should be given such a low priority in the deliberations of this House.

Thirdly, and most importantly from the Minister's point of view, if the Minister is genuinely interested in promoting the arts and the share of public expenditure going to the Office of Arts and Libraries, he must be heard far more shouting the odds for the arts and seen far more fighting his corner, and this is the place where he could most effectively do that. There is not much evidence of it here today, but we know from arts Questions that there is a very big arts lobby in both this House and the other place. Yet the arts are not given sufficient parliamentary time, perhaps because the Minister has shared responsibilities and is more interested in his Cabinet Office duties, or perhaps because he believes that the arts already receive a sufficient share of Government resources. In either case, he should tell the House.

If the Minister is really interested in gaining more resources for the arts, he is going about it in the wrong way. He should be making the case for the arts in this House and in the country generally. There are countless opportunities for an arts Minister to do that. Every respectable and semi-respectable newspaper has one or more arts correspondents — one excludes The Sun, of course, though if the Minister considered going topless he might even persuade that publication to devote some attention to the arts. Many radio and television stations are also prepared to give the Minister a platform for the arts. He could be in the news every day of his life—a wonderful opportunity that is denied to a large number of Ministers and politicians generally. I do not understand why the Minister does not seize the opportunity with both hands. If he went on the stomp for the arts around the country, he could whip up a great deal more public opinion and in the end force his ministerial colleagues, both inside and outside the Cabinet, to give him more resources for the arts. They would respond to the amount of public pressure that the Minister had helped to whip up.

In this imperfect world, made that much worse by the divisive policies of the Government, the good guys are usually ignored. I do not wish to be offensive to the Minister—I recognise that he is a pleasant and decent soul—but given the hatchet-faced men and women who are Ministers in the present Government the very fact that he is a pleasant and decent soul probably makes him singularly unfitted to be Minister for the Arts. I am not suggesting that the arts are more important than education, social services, transport or defence. I am simply arguing that they are equally important and relevant to every other area of social concern and expenditure. All too often in this society the arts are regarded as some sort of luxury, as a bit of flimsy, a bit of social decoration. They are not regarded as politically significant. That error is made by both sides of the House. The Minister for the Arts is usually regarded as occupying a rather lowly position in the political pecking order. That has been true, and at the moment it remains true, in both the Conservative party and the Labour party. As in local government, responsibility for the arts is traditionally given to politicians who have reached the end of the political road and have their political futures behind them, but there are encouraging signs that that attitude is changing among the Opposition parties.

I put it to the Minister that by his low profile, either out of choice or by personal disposition, he has done a bad job for the arts in respect of the 1987-88 budget. There are many arguments about how much or how little the present Government have invested in the arts. I use the word "invested" deliberately. Like Oscar Wilde, I have no great love of those who know the price of everything and the value of nothing, but the Minister must not be allowed to continue to make his extravagant and at times very misleading statistical claims. According to the Government, the grant to the Arts Council has risen by 8 per cent. in real terms since 1979-80, but no one in the art world believes that.

I will give some of the facts. The basic Arts Council grant was £63·125 million in 1979-80. In 1987-88 it will be £113·8 million. That is the basic grant. I am excluding abolition money because it is not new money for the arts. If one measures those figures against the retail price index, they represent a real decrease of 3 per cent. against the RPI between 1979-80 and 1987-88. There is a difference between the figures that are being bandied about. The Minister uses the gross domestic product deflator rather than the RPI for calculating the changes in the grant. The most relevant index for the arts is the average earnings index. If that index had been applied to the Arts Council between 1979-80 and 1987-88, it would be seen to have suffered a 22 per cent. cut in its grant in real terms.

The Minister may ask, "Why use the average earnings index?" The answer is obvious as 60 per cent. of arts expenditure is in direct labour costs. One can be even fairer, however, and use the arts index employed by the Cork theatre inquiry — 60 per cent. average earnings index and 40 per cent. retail price index. If one uses the Cork index, which seems the most appropriate for the arts, the decrease in the Arts Council grant, between 1979-80 and 1987-88, is 15 per cent. To make the calculation, assumptions are made of a 6 per cent. increase in average earnings for 1987-88 and a 3·5 per cent. increase in the retail price index, which I think is a conservative estimate as the general feeling is that for 1987-88 inflation will be running at about 5 per cent.

If we compare the period 1984-85, when there was a strong downward pressure on earnings and prices, with 1987-88, which is the most helpful comparison for the Government, the arts index shows an 8·5 per cent decrease in the Arts Council's grant. If we use the Cork arts index to compare the periods 1986-87 to 1987-88, the decrease in real terms for the Arts Council is 1·5 per cent. All the time we are talking about real decreases in the money that the Minister has made available to the Arts Council.

What has been the impact for the arts? The Arts Council can pass on to its clients only that which the Government give it in central funds. That means that for 1987-88 the great majority of Arts Council clients will receive real cuts in their budgets. As both Priestley and Rayner discovered, the major arts organisations are efficiently run; they are not profligate, as some members on both sides of the House would maintain. One of the advantages of my speaking on the matter now is that the Arts Council has made its decisions, and we know that the National Theatre, the Royal Shakespeare Company, the Royal Opera House and the South Bank board have been given stand-still grants. In effect, that means that they will face real cuts of the order of 6 to 7 per cent. Even English National Opera, which has been given a 2·6 per cent. increase in its grant, will be facing a cut after allowing for inflation. I could go through each of the clients of the Arts Council to prove the point, but I do not think that there is any need to take it further.'

The arts now face a double failure—first a failure by the Arts Council to act as an aggressive campaigning lobby for the Arts. The reappointment of Sir William Rees-Mogg shows how highly the Government regard him, which, I imagine, shows how little he must have troubled them on behalf of the arts. The other failure is the failure of the Minister to win more Government resources for the arts, if he ever attempted to do so. I would be obliged if the Minister would reply to that point. That double failure of the Arts Council and the Government means that the arts in Britain are desperately in need of friends.

In the end, all the arguments about Government financial support for the arts are about insignificant crumbs when one considers the extent of the Government's public expenditure each year. For 1987-88, total Government spending will amount to £148 billion. The total arts budget—all the money in addition to the Arts Council grant which goes to museums, art galleries, libraries; the lot—amounts to £339 million. That is less than one quarter of 1 per cent. of the Government's total spending. That is crazy. The £339 million for total arts spending amounts to less than one year's expenditure on fortress Falklands, which is now running at £1 million a day. The Government wrote off £1 billion of taxpayers' money in respect of Nimrod, and that represents 10 years of total arts spending on the Arts Council grant.

That is the scale of the difference in the spending patterns of the Government. Their priorities are all wrong in this respect. What, in future years, will be the most treasured legacy that we shall be passing on to succeeding generations? Will it be the scrap metal of once expensive military hardware or the timeless cultural heritage of music, plays, literature and works of art? By virtue of the miserable 1987-88 arts provision, the Government have yet again revealed their perverted social priorities, lack of vision and philistine mentality. The arts world in its entirety is now praying for the return of a Labour Government.

The Minister for the Arts (Mr. Richard Luce): I start by congratulating the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on achieving this Adjournment debate, even though he says, "third time lucky". I can assure him that it was no intention of mine, and I have no powers, to seek to delay an Adjournment debate. Whether it could have been achieved before Christmas was entirely in the hands of the House. For my part, I am glad that he has this debate because it gives me yet another chance to talk about the arts.

My congratulations must end there. Some of the things that the hon. Gentleman says are extraordinary. Not long ago he asked me what my activities in the arts world had been in the previous year and a half or so. I gave him a full answer which showed that I travel round all parts of the country and have visited over 150 arts organisations. Each time I go out I talk to the media in the regions, who take an intense interest in the arts. Since arts should be available for all people in Britain, it is important to get out and about and see what is happening. That is the key to this debate. Therefore, I shall seek to answer some of the hon. Gentleman's points.

The hon. Gentleman sometimes reminds me of that great character from English literature, A. A. Milne's Eeyore, who, whenever confronted with news of any kind, would contrive to turn it into forebodings of doom.

Last year, for instance, the hon. Gentleman forecast for the South Bank:

"dark nights in all the theatres and concert halls". — [Official Report, 14 November 1985 ; Vol. 86, c. 702.]

He forecast enormous suffering from the great centres of art to and estimated a shortfall in arts funding in London which would run to about £10 million in that year. Of course, none of that proved to be true, as we all know.

"the smallest of the touring companies." — [Official Report, 27 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 1102.]

What are the facts? Let me get to the heart of them. The central arts and libraries expenditure for 1987-88 will rise by 5·4 per cent., which is broadly in line with the increase for public expenditure as a whole that year. The hon. Gentleman made play with the criteria for those statistics and said that he would rather have the earnings or the retail prices index. The plain fact is that the GDP deflator is the understood measurement for that type of public expenditure, and it was used by the Labour Government in the 1970s. That is the standard understanding of the basis upon which we calculate those prices and increases. There has been a 5·4 per cent. increase in the overall expenditure, in line with the general increase of public expenditure that year.

The arts have not lost out. The new British Library project is, of course, part of that programme. It was a 1979 manifesto commitment and we have upheld it. We are reaching the peak years of expenditure on that major new institution, which will be for the benefit of learning in this country. I hope that the hon. Gentleman supports that. Some people say that that project has nothing to do with the arts, but arts and libraries should go together because each has a mission of civilising and enriching that complements the other. I am not suggesting that the hon. Gentleman is attacking the Library. However, we must take the British Library into account when we consider the global arts expenditure figures.

Mr. Tony Banks: That is why the percentage that the Minister has given is being pushed up.

Mr. Luce: We must take every component part of the arts budget into account. We should consider our national galleries and museums, the British Library and also the performing arts.

I shall now turn to specific aspects concerning the Arts Council. Next year's budget gives it an increase of 3·5 per cent. in its basic funding from central Government. That is broadly in line with predicted inflation. Over and above that—the hon. Gentleman did not recognise this fact—I have managed to provide an extra £3 million for the Arts Council, which it did not expect, to lessen the incidence of the taper on abolition funding. I know that the hon. Gentleman feels strongly about that.

To put it mildly, there seems to be considerable confusion as to what the hon. Gentleman's party's policy on the arts is. The Government have upheld their policy commitment to keep up central Government funding support for the arts. Indeed, we have surpassed our commitment. The Arts Council grant is up by over 7 per cent. in real terms since 1979-80. If one includes abolition money—the hon. Gentleman chooses not to do so, but I accept that there has been a shift from local to central Government—the Arts Council's grant has risen by 32 per cent. in real terms. It is receiving more in real terms than it ever did under any previous Government. I should have thought that that was an occasion for praise rather than for criticism by the hon. Gentleman.

I recognise that there are continuing problems and pressures in certain areas, many of which arise from the increasingly competing demands in the arts world. It is for the Arts Council to seek ways to overcome them, often in conjunction with regional arts associations, local authorities and the private sector.

It is becoming increasingly difficult for the purveyors of pessimism to forecast Armageddon and "cataclysmic collapses" when they are faced, as they are, by the evidence all around us of a remarkable growth of interest and participation in the arts. Even The Guardian recognised that in a recent reference to the "positive flowering" of the arts. There has been a resurgence in cinema attendances, a virtual doubling of the number of arts centres since 1979, a doubling of the number of museums over the past 15 years, with a new museum reportedly opening every fortnight now, more people attending the theatre than going to football matches, and in autumn 1986 Greater London Arts claimed, in its quarterly journal, to fund "more arts activities by more artists, in more areas than ever before".

The evidence is there on nearly every front, but the hon. Gentleman simply chooses to ignore it. I see those developments for myself as I travel round the country. As he will know from my answer to his recent question, I have visited over 150 arts organisations. Only two evenings ago, on Wednesday, I visited the Temba theatre to see "Woza Albert!" I can assure the hon. Gentleman that there was no lack of enthusiasm or vigour in the performance. The Temba theatre is financially supported by the Arts Council, among others.

There are many other examples of success stories, rather than failures, upon which the hon. Gentleman could focus. There is, for example the Beck theatre in the borough of Hillingdon where Charles Vance Ltd. has been brought in to help run the centre and is saving the Hillingdon authority considerable sums of money over the next five years by its very efficient running of the theatre.

There is also the interesting example of the Empire theatre in Liverpool, where Apollo Leisure is playing a leading part in helping to make it a success and to save the taxpayer and the ratepayer money. That is an example of how partnerships between the private and public sectors can play a positive role.

The Institute of Contemporary Arts is now celebrating its 40th anniversary, and I am sure that both sides of the House congratulate it on that. It is increasingly dependent upon resources from a variety of areas, especially the private sector, even though the Arts Council has managed to increase its support.

The hon. Gentleman continues to be one of many on the Opposition Benches who were profoundly pessimistic about the effect on the arts of the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan counties, but the fact is that I was able to increase the Arts Council funding for abolition purposes in the current financial year from the £16 million originally allocated to £25 million.

The Arts Council had calculated the total requirement for arts bodies that served a wider area than a single borough at £35 million, and I was confident that the successor authorities — the London boroughs, the districts and the metropolitan county areas — would come forward with the remaining £10 million. In the event, they did much better than that. I congratulate them. After some intricate bargaining, the Arts Council contribution was matched by £14 million from the local authorities. No major arts body went to the wall, and many have expanded since then. The crisis did not happen. Of course, I look to the local authorities to play an increasingly important role in the financing of arts organisations.

In the past, the hon. Gentleman has referred repeatedly to the South Bank. The Arts Council has allocated £8·76 million for 1987-88, and I am confident that it will continue following the constructive policy of keeping the best from the previous GLC regime while introducing sensible innovations of its own. This is an appropriate occasion to congratulate Mr. Ronnie Grierson and his board on the South Bank. Their ambitious programme for the future includes the material refurbishment of the whole area. They are doing a splendid job.

The record of this Government on the arts is one of which we may be proud. We promised to uphold central Government support for the arts and we have done so. We said that we would ease the transition in the abolition areas and we have done so. But the hon. Gentleman, like his colleagues, has far too narrow a vision of the arts. It is a profound mistake to think that the climate in the arts is determined solely by the level of central Government funding. Important though that funding is, the whole thrust of our strategy has been to encourage the funding of arts from a plurality of sources. Central Government, local government, businesses, private patrons, and above all the consumer at the box office all have an essential contribution to make.

In addition, it has been part of our strategy of creating a framework of opportunity for the arts to encourage and promote business and private support. The business sponsorship incentive scheme began two years ago. That scheme, ably administered by the Association for Business Sponsorship of the Arts has dramatically accelerated the rate of growth of business sponsorship until it is now running at the rate of some £25 million a year. I know that the hon. Gentleman welcomes that scheme and I trust that he will share my optimism that business sponsorship will continue to flourish to the benefit of the arts throughout the country.

While I am on this subject, I am sure that the House will join me in welcoming the announcement this week that Sainsbury's arts sponsorship committee is to give over £100,000 to the National Youth theatre. That is a marvellous memorial to the late Michael Croft, who built up the theatre over a period of 30 years. In the same way, the measures announced in the 1986 Budget to encourage charitable giving will enable both corporations and individuals, through single donations and the payroll scheme, to increase their contributions to the arts.

The hon. Gentleman is also using too narrow a focus when he neglects to look at the consumer side of the equation. In fact, the dominant factor in arts expenditure is the consumer. It is for that reason that the Arts Council has recently established a marketing department that is designed to help arts institutions to target their customers and provide the services that the customers would like to see. To help foster this new climate of opportunity, I have recently announced a new arts marketing scheme with a budget of £0·25 million of public money, to encourage arts bodies to market themselves more actively and effectively. The scheme will take the form of matching grants to enable arts organisations to put into practice a selected number of new and original marketing ideas—the results will be available for the benefit of others.

The hon. Gentleman has argued the case for greater funding of the Arts Council. I confess that I—and I think many in the country—are highly confused as to what his party's policy on the Arts Council is. He wants to expand its funding, but a recent policy document by his party appeared to envisage emasculating it entirely. I do not know what the position is, now that disaster has befallen the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan). However that may be, the Government's support for the principle of "arms length", and for the excellent work of the Arts Council, is very clear. I gladly pay tribute to the way in which its secretary-general Mr. Luke Rittner and his staff carry out their duties. I add my appreciation for the outstanding contribution of Sir William Rees-Mogg, who has recently agreed to continue as chairman of the Arts Council for a further two years. I have noticed during my time in office that neither of those two gentlemen hesitate to make their views known, in public and in private, about what they think is required in funding for the Arts Council. I have every confidence that the Arts Council will continue to do an excellent job.

Question put and agreed to.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Third World (Debt Burden)

64. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy towards relieving the debt burden of Third world countries.

67. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any new proposals for the reduction of the debt burden of developing countries.

Mr. Chris Patten: We believe that both creditor and debtor countries have a role to play in tackling the debt problem. Creditor countries need to promote sustained growth in the world economy, while maintaining open markets. Individual debtor countries need to adjust their economies, supported by the necessary external finance. With others, we will continue to play an active part in seeking to increase the flow of resources to debtor countries in support of adjustment.

India

68. Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he is reviewing project aid to India; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The aid programme to India, including project aid, is kept under regular review. At the bilateral aid talks in December we advised the Indian Government that we would welcome new project proposals in sectors where we believe we could make a strong contribution. For tied aid they include power, coal and water. For poverty alleviating projects they include slum improvement, natural resources, water and sanitation, and family planning and health.

Vaccination (United Nations Programme)

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contribution the United Kingdom will make to the United Nations international children's emergency fund programme of vaccination of children by 1990.

Mr. Chris Patten: We expect to continue to contribute to UNICEF's regular budget, which underpins the immunisation programme, and from time to time to special appeals. Much of our £1 million response to the latest UNICEF special appeal for Africa is being spent on immunisation programmes. I am considering the possibility of further help and will be discussing the issue with UNICEF shortly.

Overseas Aid Budget

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage of gross domestic product was represented by the overseas aid budget in each of the years 1978 to 1986, inclusive; and what he expects it to be in the next three years.

Mr. Chris Patten: Net public expenditure on overseas aid as defined in British Aid Statistics, copies of which are in the Library of the House, as a percentage of GDP in 1978-85 was as follows:

	Percentage
1978	0·42
1979	0·44
1980	0·37
1981	0·42
1982	0·36
1983	0·36
1985	0·34

Figures are not yet available for 1986. It is not Government policy to forecast what the percentage is likely to be in future years.

PRIME MINISTER

EC (United Kingdom Presidency)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the achievements of the United Kingdom's presidency of the European Community Council of Ministers.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs the Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker) gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Mr. Shaw) on 19 December 1986, at columns 761 and 762.

A detailed list of United Kingdom presidency achievements will be placed in the Library of the House shortly.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Prime Minister whether the intention of the Government of the Republic of Ireland to introduce extradition in accordance with the European Convention for the Suppression of Terrorism was conditional upon any matter within the Anglo Irish Agreement; what information she has as to the stage which this proposal by the Irish Government has now reached; and if she is satisfied with its progress.

The Prime Minister: Paragraph 7 of the joint communiqué of 15 November 1985, Cmnd. 9657, stated that at its initial meetings the Intergovernmental Conference would work for early progress in relations between the security forces and the minority community in Northern Ireland, ways of enhancing security co-operation between the two Governments and seeking measures which would give substantial expression to the aim of underlining the importance of public confidence in the administration of justice. The Irish Government announced that, against this background, they intended to accede as soon as possible to the European convention on the suppression of terrorism. The question of conditions did not arise.

The Government have already welcomed the fact that a Bill to enable Irish ratification of the convention without reservation has passed through all its stages in the Dail.

South Africa (Sanctions)

Mrs. Beckett asked the Prime Minister how many letters she has received (a) in support of and (b) against the Government's stand on sanctions against South Africa; and of each of these, how many are from individuals and how many on behalf of organisations.

The Prime Minister: Since 1 May 1986 I have received about 2,800 letters opposing, and about 5,900 supporting, the Government's stand on sanctions against South Africa. No further breakdown of these figures is available.

La Belle Discotheque (Bombing)

Mr. Dobson asked the Prime Minister if she will publish the signals which showed that the Libyan Government were behind the Berlin night club terrorist bombing.

The Prime Minister: Because of its nature and source, we cannot agree to make public our evidence of Libyan involvement.

Mr. Dobson asked the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government had any knowledge, at the time of the United States bombing of Libya, of Syrian involvement in the Berlin night club terrorist bombing.

The Prime Minister: We know of no evidence of Syrian involvement in the bombing of La Belle discotheque in Berlin on 5 April 1986.

Mr. Dobson asked the Prime Minister what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken since the United States bombing of Libya to find out from the West German or United States Governments evidence of Libyan or Syrian involvement in the Berlin night club terrorist bombing.

The Prime Minister: We have kept closely in touch with other Governments on this matter. There is clear evidence of Libyan involvement in the bombing of La Belle discotheque; as far as we are aware, there is none of Syrian involvement.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Trade Statistics

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the percentage of United Kingdom exports of manufactures and visible trade, respectively, which go to the present members of the European Economic Community; and what was the comparable percentage for exports to these nations in each of the previous four years.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is in the table.

Proportion of United Kingdom Exports Going to the European Community

	OTS Basis Per cent.
	Total Visible Trade	Manufactures
1982	44	40
1983	46	40

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of the European Economic Community's market for manufactures is covered by British exports; and what was the comparable percentage for the same nations in each of the previous four years.

Mr. Alan Clark: In 1986, the United Kingdom share of the European Community's imports of manufactures is provisionally estimated to have been approximately 8 per cent. The figures for the previous years are in the table.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many civil servants employed by his Department and engaged primarily on regional matters are based in (a) Yorkshire and Humberside, (b) the north-east and (c) the north-west.

Mr. Butcher: On 15 December 1986, the following numbers of regionally-based staff were engaged primarily on regional matters:

	Number
Yorkshire and Humberside	106
North-East	202
North-West	224

Ed Doolan

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what purpose, and at what fee, Ed Doolan has been employed under the National Quality Campaign.

Mr. Butcher: Mr. Doolan was retained at normal consultancy rates by the Department earlier this year to promote the National Quality Campaign in the West Midlands. He is visiting companies throughout the region to talk about the "total" or "company-wide" approach to quality featured in the campaign, and to explain the practical and financial support available to firms seeking to improve their quality performance.

Industrial Innovation (Support)

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give the level of support for industrial innovation under section 8 of the Industrial Development Act 1982 paid out in Scotland in each year since 1982; if he will express this support as a percentage of total United Kingdom payments in each year; and if he will give the percentage changes in support between years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information is as follows:

	Scotland £'000	United Kingdom £'000	Scotland as percentage of United Kingdom	Year on year change Scotland Per cent.	Year on year change United Kingdom Per cent.
1982-83	447	5,300	8·4	—	—
1983-84	1,514	19,879	7·6	238·7	275·1
1984-85	1,134	36,218	3·1	(25·1)	82·2
1985-86	1,430	30,757	4·6	26·1	(15·1)

Note: "Support for industrial innovation" is taken as compromising the Microelectronics Industry Support Programme, Investment Support for Microelectronics, Support for Advanced Manufacturing Technology, Investment Support for Fibre Optics and Optoelectronics, the Innovation Linked Investment Scheme, and Computer-Aided Design and Test Equipment Support.

EC (Trading Barriers)

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on recent progress to remove trading barriers in the European Community.

Mr. Alan Clark: During the United Kingdom presidency—July–December 1986—the Council adopted or agreed 48 individual measures which will help remove barriers to trade in the Community. This represents a substantial acceleration in progress towards completing the internal market.

Details of 41 of the measures were given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in an answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), Official Report, 19 December 1986, cols 765-768. The following measures were agreed before the end of the presidency:

Antidioxides
Amendment to Antioxidents Directive.

Public Procurement (Supplies)
Improvements to the EC Supplies Directives, specifying rules for the award of public sector supplies contracts.

Information Technology and Telecommunications Standards
Use of European standards for public purchases when buying IT and telecommunication equipment.

Noise of hydraulic excavators, dozers and loaders
Directive setting noise limits for hydraulic diggers and excavators.

Energy Labelling
Agreement on tolerance levels to be applied in checks on energy labels.

Live animals of the bovine species: amended eradication directives to provide for the final eradication of tuberculosis, brucellosis and leucosis in all Member States including Portugal and Spain
Directive extending EC funding to accelerate schemes for the eradication of tuberculosis, brucellosis and leucosis.

Amendment to Directives 72/461/EEC and 72/462/EEC
Amends Directive on animal health on imports of fresh meat to facilitate imports of animal organs, blood etc.

Shares Manipulation (Anglo-Canadian Investigations)

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretaryof State for Trade and Industry if he will approach the Canadian Government with a view to setting up investigations in conjuction with the Canadian authorities to look into the manipulation by majority shareholders and their brokers of shares quoted on both the London and Canadian stock exchanges with funds emanating from minority investors in either Canada or the United Kingdom.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. Friend is always ready to approach other regulatory authorities if he believes that they may be able to obtain and provide information about matters where the exercise of his own regulatory and investigative powers is involved.

House of Fraser Group

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report the recent correspondence he has had with the Lonrho Company about the circumstances in which the Al-Fayed family was given permission to purchase the House of Fraser group; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: No.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will refer again to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission the purchase of the House of Fraser company by the Al-Fayed family in the light of the new information which has been presented to him by Lonrho since the date of approval: and if ne will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. Friend is considering carefully material submitted on behalf of Lonrho plc concerning the purchase of House of Fraser by the Fayed family. He will decide what action if any to take in the light of that consideration, and the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has yet replied to the letter dated 18 December from the chairman of Lonrho plc regarding an offer in respect of the House of Fraser.

Mr. Howard: Yes. A reply was sent on 5 January.

Insider Dealings

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what grades of civil servant will be covered by his inquiry into insider share dealings; if they will be asked to give details of all their share transactions during the relevant period; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The powers vested in the inspectors under section 177 of the Financial Services Act can be exercised in respect of any person—and thus any civil servant—whom the inspectors consider is or may be able to give information concerning a contravention of the Company Securities (Insider Dealing) Act. It is for the inspectors to judge whether the details of any individual's dealings may be relevant to the investigation.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Council of Ministers (Presidency)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the achievements of the United Kingdom's presidency of the European Community Council of Ministers in respect of foreign affairs.

Mr. Eggar: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker) gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Mr. Shaw) on 19 December 1986.

A detailed list of United Kingdom Presidency achievements will be placed in the Library of the House shortly.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the achievements of the United Kingdom's presidency of the European Community Council of Ministers in respect of anti-terrorism measures.

Mr. Eggar: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker) to my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) on 20 November 1986, to the reply that my right hon. and learned Friend gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) on 3 December 1986 and to the statement that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made on 8 December following the European Council.

During our United Kingdom Presidency of the European Community we have given high priority to measures to combat terrorism. Ministers met in the TREVI group on 25 September and 9 December and there was an informal meeting of Interior and Justice Ministers on 20 October. The subject was also discussed by Foreign Ministers meeting in political co-operation and the European Council.

These meetings have resulted in enhanced practical co-operation between member states on counter-terrorism measures including the setting up of a secure communications link between police forces of the member states; intensification of liaison between counter-terrorism experts and mutual exchanges of information about people excluded from the territory of any one member state. A working group was set up to recommend ways of tightening the Community's external frontiers. Common measures were also taken against Syria following the Hindawi trial and the European Council agreed the principles which will govern the fight against terrorism for the future. EC heads of Government will examine progress made at their next meeting. The Government will play their full part in ensuring that solidarity among the Twelve in the face of terrorist threat is put into practice at every level of co-operation.

Mr. Oleg Gordievsky

Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any representations have been received from the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics regarding the case of Mr. Oleg Gordievsky.

Mr. Renton: It is not our practice to comment on security matters.

Disarmament

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what responses he has had to the paper, "Seismic Monitoring for a Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban", submitted to the conference on disarmament in July 1985; and if he will make responses available in the Library.

Mr. Renton: At the conference on disarmament in Geneva there has been only one technical paper (CD712) directly commenting on the United Kingdom's paper. As with all CD papers, a copy is available in the Library of the House.

There have been a number of comments in the United Kingdom on CD610. Most recently, "Modern Geology" published a number of articles on it; a copy is in the Library of the House. These articles were noted in the national press at the time, including a commentary in the Guardian of 20 November. This, like the articles, was misleading in several respects.

The "dramatic new evidence" presented under the title of "Earthquake in Kazakhstan" is neither new nor dramatic. The seismograms illustrated are from seismic disturbances that took place seven and a half years ago, on 14 September 1979. Contrary to claims in the articles, the seismograms in question were not obtained by high frequency means. The signals were recorded and detected automatically using the standard processing system at the NORSAR array in Norway. NORESS, the high frequency array, had not been installed at that time, and data from high frequency systems are not available for these seismic disturbances. In any case, there is some evidence that the high frequency content of signals caused by small earthquakes is rather like that from similarly sized nuclear explosions in regions of similar geology.

The earthquake occurred not in Kazakhstan as stated, but in the Kamchatka region, some 5,800 km distant. Geological differences and the size of the seismic disturbances rather than high frequency detection techniques, are responsible for differences in the frequency content of the seismogram. As stated in the articles, a spike-like feature identified in the lower trace originated from Kazakhstan. However we cannot be certain that it was caused by a nuclear explosion; the USSR does not, as a matter of policy, announce such tests. It would hardly be surprising if the signals from two widely separated regions differ in their characteristics.

In response to technical comments on the United Kingdom paper, the Government prepared in mid-1986 a response to press and "Modern Geology" reports. I am placing a copy of this in the Library of the House. It deals with three main areas:

(a) claims for the effectiveness of high frequency monitoring;

(b) claims that the M_b:M_s criterion provides a reliable and effective means of distinguishing between nuclear explosions and natural seismic events;

(c) claims that unannounced nuclear explosions in the US had been detected in Sweden, when in actual fact the explosions in question were detected and reported in the US and the relevant information then passed and republished by interested circles in Sweden.

Chemical Warfare

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of Sate for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what studies have been made of the likely effects on progress towards a chemical warfare treaty of the French Government's proposal to develop a binary chemical weapon; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) on 9 December 1986. There has been encouraging progress in the negotiations towards a global ban on chemical weapons under British Chairmanship of the ad hoc committee in 1986.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of Sate for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when Her Majesty's Government last tabled proposals on verification for a chemical warfare treaty; what progress has been made on those proposals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: A British paper on the crucial verification issue of challenge inspection was tabled when I visited the conference on disarmament on 15 July 1986. Our proposals have been welcomed by many delegations and are currently under discussion in the negotiations in Geneva.

Terrorism

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he intends to raise with Mr. Peter Barry, the Irish Foreign Minister, the decision by the Government of the Irish Republic to defer ratification of the European convention on terrorism until December 1987; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: No.

Visa Regulations

Mr. Greville Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received opposing the new visa regulations.

Mr. Eggar: We have received a number of letters from student and other organisations and from members of the public.

Mr. Greville Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much the implementation of the new visa regulations has cost.

Mr. Eggar: I have nothing to add to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 24 October 1986.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

High Court Judges

55. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Attorney-General if the Lord Chancellor proposes to increase the number of judges sitting in the Queen's Bench division of the High Court.

The Solicitor-General: The number of judges in the Queen's Bench division was increased by two, from 49 to 51, in September 1986. The number of High Court judges overall and within each division is kept under continuing review.

Anglo Irish Agreement

57. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Attorney-General what recent conversations he has had with the Attorney-General of the Irish Republic within the framework of the Anglo Irish Intergovernmental conference or otherwise.

The Attorney-General: I have had two recent conversations with the Attorney-General for the Republic of Ireland concerning matters of common concern.

State Security

58. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Attorney-General in how many cases during the last 12 months he has acted on behalf of Her Majesty's Government in seeking injunctions to prevent the publication of books.

The Attorney-General: I have acted in two such cases: the Peter Wright manuscript—proceedings were in fact instituted in 1985—and the Joan Miller book "One Girl's War".

Crown Prosecution Service

59. Mr. Whitfield asked the Attorney-General how many representations to the Director of Public Prosecutions he has received for or on behalf of chief officers of police about the standard of service provided by the Crown Prosecution Service.

The Attorney-General: I have received no representations of the nature mentioned in the question. The Director of Public Prosecutions has established a senior liaison committee as a forum for discussion of matters of mutual interest to the Crown Prosecution Service and other agencies within the criminal justice system, including the Association of Chief Police Officers. Discussions with ACPO in that forum have been wide ranging and constructive. Press reports critical of the CPS and apparently based on comments by individual police officers do not accurately reflect the working relationship between the Crown Prosecution Service and the police service.

60. Mr. Burt asked the Attorney-General how many staff have been recruited to the Crown Prosecution Service since 1 April.

The Attorney-General: Recruitment in the Crown Prosecution Service has been conducted in accordance with the practice within the Civil Service. Thus, clerical and support staff, including those in the secretarial group, have been recruited locally under delegated arrangements. Recruitment in respect of all other grades has been by means of national open competition under the auspices of the Civil Service Commission. The combined figures for local and central recruitment for the period 1 April 1986 to 31 December 1986 are as follows:

Category	Number recruited
Clerical Support Staff (including Secretarial Group)	395
Executive Support Staff	242
Lawyers (141 Crown Prosecutors 34 Senior Crown Prosecutors)	175
	812

Much of the recruitment activity has been directed towards London and the figures for London, included in those given previously, are as follows:

		Number
Clerical Support Staff		180
Executive Support Staff		195
Lawyers
Crown Prosecutors	62

These figures do not include those staff who transferred to the Crown Prosecution Service under the transfer of staff regulations.

So far as lawyer posts are concerned, arrangements have been made for the Civil Service Commission to continue to organise monthly competitions. These will be confined largely to entry at Crown prosecutor level and will chiefly be for allocation within London. Recent competitions have continued to yield approximately 100 applications per round and there is no reason to suppose that the recruitment of lawyers will fall away. The Crown Prosecution Service will therefore continue to apply rigorous standards to recruitment seeking to engage only the most suitable candidates.

Recruitment of support staff has resulted in the Crown Prosecution Service being fully up to complement with ad hoc recruitment being used solely to replace natural wastage or to meet increases in complement.

Serious Fraud

61. Mr. William Powell asked the Attorney-General whether any preparatory steps are being taken with a view to the establishment of the serious fraud office provided for in clause 1 of the Criminal Justice Bill; and whether he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Following the Second Reading of the Criminal Justice Bill, an interdepartmental working group chaired by my legal secretary has been established to oversee the necessary preparatory work. This will include drawing up a comprehensive assessment of its functions, planning its mode of operation and liaising with police service on matters of mutual interest. In addition, preliminary steps will be taken on staffing arrangements and as regards accommodation. But the role of the working group will be an interim one until it is possible to appoint senior managers and for them to assume effective control.

Mr. Rupert Allason

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Attorney-General whether he will prosecute Mr. Rupert Allason under section 7 of the Official Secrets Act 1920 for inciting Mr. Arthur Martin to break his duty of confidentiality on security matters to the Crown in respect of information to be included in his book "A Matter of Trust."

The Attorney-General: No.

117 Pierce Avenue, Solihull

Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the problems concerning the title to the property known as 117 Pierce Avenue, Solihull (Treasury Solicitor ref. Bv 2358/86/Bs) and the delay in selling that property.

The Attorney-General: The property to which the hon. Member refers was originally offered for sale by a receiver appointed by the Court of Protection. When the owner of the property died in August 1986 the receiver's authority ceased; and since it appeared that she had died intestate and without known relatives the matter was referred to the Treasury Solicitor for consideration whether the estate fell to be administered by him on behalf of the Crown by virtue of section 46(vi) of the Administration of Estates Act 1925.

The Treasury Solicitor's inquiries are proceeding, but in order to avoid delay he proposes to apply to the court for authority to sell the property to the proposed purchasers or, if they are unable or unwilling to complete, on the advice of the district valuer.

"The Sun"

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Attorney-General what factors he took into account in deciding not to grant his consent to the prosecution of the editor of The Sun and the cartoonist who signs his name as Franklin in respect of an allegation that they had committed on offence contrary to section 5A of the Public Order Act 1936; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I took into account all the relevant circumstances of the case when reaching my decision. These circumstances included as one—I stress one—of the facts, a mistake in my Department which arose from a misunderstanding between myself and an official and led to the complainants and the staff at The Sun being wrongly informed that I had decided to prosecute. The true position was that I simply wished police enquiries to be made.

Newspaper Cartoons

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Attorney-General what criteria he uses in deciding whether a newspaper cartoon is sufficiently inflammatory to justify his consent to a prosecution under section 5A of the Public Order Act 1936; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I take my decisions on the basis, first, of an objective assessment of whether sufficient evidence is available to prove the offence. On this and other aspects of a case, I of course usually have the advantage of the advice of the Director of Public Prosecutions. So far as cases under section 5A of the Public Order Act 1936 are concerned, whether they relate to a newspaper cartoon or material of any other kind, it is necessary to show that there has been a publication of matter which is threatening, abusive or insulting. A publication must also be such that, having regard to all the circumstances, hatred is likely to be stirred up by the material in question against a racial group in Great Britain. Here the relevant factors are likely to include the nature of the publication, its circulation, the market at which it is aimed, as well as any special sensitivity prevailing at the time of publication which might influence the effect on those who read it of the material in question.

Having satisfied myself that the evidence is sufficient, I consider, secondly, whether, in the particular case, the public interest requires a prosecution. Each case is judged on its own facts and I have no hard and fast rule. However, I am very much aware of the damage to harmounious race relations and good order which may flow from the type of material covered by the section.

TRANSPORT

London Regional Transport

13. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will raise the matter of the provision of bus shelters when he next meets the chairman of London Regional Transport.

Mr. David Mitchell: Probably not.

30. Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of London Regional Transport, he will raise with him the subject of bus services in London.

Mr. David Mitchell: I would expect this to be among the items which are discussed when I next meet Dr. Bright.

31. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has held recent discussions with London Regional Transport on improvements in bus and underground services in the Greater London area.

Mr. David Mitchell: This was among the items discussed when my right hon. Friend last met Dr. Bright at the London Passenger Transport Group.

M11 (Service Areas)

14. Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received any representations about the siting of the M11 services area at Birchanger; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A number of representations have been received from and on behalf of local people. The petition to this House was published on 31 October. We have considered the points made. We think the chosen site is satisfactory.

Car Commuting

15. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any estimates of the increase in car commuting caused by each 10 per cent. increase in rail fares; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: The impact of fare increases will vary from area to area depending on local commuting conditions and rail market share.

Greater Manchester

16. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans his Department has for major road projects in the Greater Manchester area; and what are the implications for employment.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Contracts worth £70 million have already been let for widening M63 and for construction of the Portwood to Denton section of the Manchester outer ring road. There are plans for over £200 million further investment in major road projects.

One of the major objectives of all national trunk road schemes is to help economic recovery by reducing transport costs. Completion of the ring road will assist the economic development of Greater Manchester by improving communications within the area.

Regional Airports

17. Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the growth in traffic at regional airports since 1979.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Total passenger traffic at United Kingdom airports other than those serving the London area grew by 25 per cent. between 1979 and 1985 and figures for the first nine months of 1986 show an increase of 13 per cent. over 1985.

Rail Electrification

18. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received any request from British Rail to approve investment for the electrification of the railway between Bradford and Leeds.

Mr. David Mitchell: No.

Drink Driving

19. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Christmas drink driving campaign.

Mr. Moore: Our message that drivers who drink are a menace to society captured wide public support. Nevertheless, figures of positive breath tests over the holiday period still show that too many drivers are putting their own and other people's lives at risk. Though it is too early to assess the impact of the campaign, a full analysis will be undertaken when all the data are available later in the year.

Lost Property

20. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will amend regulations to allow public transport authorities a greater degree of flexibility in regard to the requirements that charges be made to allow the return of lost property.

Mr. David Mitchell: This is not necessary. The amending regulations made in 1981 already give operators power to waive charges for the return of lost property if they wish.

Airline Competition

21. Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to review his airline competition policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: No. The Government's policy remains as set out in the 1984 White Paper on airline competition policy.

Road Safety

22. Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further action after the Christmas drink/drive campaign he proposes in road safety publicity.

Mr. Moore: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton).

Physically Disabled People

23. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied with the facilities available for the transport of the physically disabled in the light of the Transport Act 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Act requires local authorities to take into account the transport needs of people who are elderly or disabled, and provides grant-making powers. The Department will continue to supply technical and policy guidance for operators, working closely with the new Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee.

Vehicle Registrations

24. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of the total number of heavy goods vehicle and motor car registrations, respectively; and how these figures compare with ten years previously.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: At December 1985 the licensed stock of heavy goods vehicles in Great Britain was 432,000, which is 23 per cent. below the 1975 figure. These fewer vehicles moved 11 per cent. more tonne kilometres of goods than in 1975. Over the same period the stock of cars increased by 23 per cent. to 16¼ million.

A33 (Swallowfield—Basingstoke)

25. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give consideration to proposals for the trunking of the A33 between Swallowfield, near Reading and Basingstoke.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Our recent review of the existing national network did not identify this length of the A33 as a candidate for trunk road status.

Manchester Airport

26. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport what decisions his Department has taken regarding the Manchester airport rail link; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: None so far. We welcome the cost-sharing agreement between Greater Manchester PTA, Manchester Airport PLC and British Rail, reached last October. We understand that the parties wish to seek grant from the European regional development fund. We still await their application for that.

Channel Tunnel

27. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a further statement on the progress being made in the Channel tunnel project and on steps being taken to safeguard security of passengers travelling through the tunnel.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Channel tunnel project remains on target for the commencement of construction next summer, subject of course to enactment of the Channel Tunnel Bill. The British and French Governments and the Anglo-French Intergovernmental Commission and Safety Authority will ensure that acceptable arrangements are made for the security and safety of passengers.

Buses

28. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Transport what estimates he has made of the mileage currently served by buses; and how this compares with January 1985.

Mr. David Mitchell: Detailed figures are not yet available, but preliminary estimates suggest that service levels have been broadly maintained over the country as a whole.

Heavy Lorries

29. Mr. Norris asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the effect of the increase in maximum lorry weights to 38 tonnes.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We estimate that the extra capacity of 38 tonne vehicles allowed road transport needs in 1985 to be met with 5,000 fewer lorries, 250 million fewer vehicle miles and between 2 and 3 per cent. less road damage.

West Yorkshire

32. Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current level of expenditure as determined by his Department for public transport in West Yorkshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: Under the procedures provided by the Rates Act 1984 the expenditure level for West Yorkshire Passenger Transport Authority for 1986-87 was redetermined at £61·3 million on 20 December 1985. My right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State explained the considerations relevant to this decision in reply to a question on that date from my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins). I understand the PTA's budgeted expenditure for 1986-87 is £61·288 million.

TRANSPORT

British Rail (Rolling Stock)

33. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the condition of rolling stock currently employed by British Rail.

Mr. David Mitchell: British Rail has invested substantially in new rolling stock since we took office. The condition of existing rolling stock is a management matter for British Rail, but we have agreed with it standards of internal and external carriage cleaning and will be monitoring its achievement closely.

Severnside

34. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will pay an early visit to Severnside to gather evidence at first hand on future transport developments in the area.

Mr. Moore: I shall be pleased to visit Severnside in future when our proposals for a second Severn crossing have progressed further. At present I have no plans for such a visit.

Traffic Pollution (London)

35. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the effect on traffic and pollution in London of coach deregulation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The overall effect of deregulated coach services on traffic and pollution in London has been negligible. Boroughs have powers to make traffic orders to deal with local problems.

Motorway Driving

36. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce measures to seek to afford protection to motorway drivers from other drivers who harass them from behind.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department takes every opportunity to warn drivers of the dangers of driving too close. Advice is given in publicity and in the Highway Code and the manual "Driving". A simple rule—"leave two seconds between your vehicle and the one in front"—tells drivers the minimum safe gap.

"Keep your distance" is also used on experimental signs recently installed on M25, and about to be installed on M1. We shall monitor the effects.

Lorry Ban (London)

37. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent discussions he has had with the chairman or any representative of the London Residuary Body regarding its role as agent for the London boroughs in the operation of the London lorry ban.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: None. How the London Residuary Body discharges the agency role for London boroughs is not a matter for me.

Road Schemes (London)

38. Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many road schemes in London are currently under construction and assisted by transport supplementary grant from his Department.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The TSG settlement for the current year covers 23 major schemes worth £250 million. These are:

		£ million
Bexley	Bexleyheath Northern relief road	4·5
Bromley	Bromley High street stage 2	20·5
Ealing, Hillingdon and Hounslow	Hayes bypass	51·9
Enfield and Haringey	North-south route	78·3
Greenwich	Beresford street/Plumstead road	0·7
	Woolwich High street improvement	2·4
	Woolwich road widening stage 1	2·2
Harrow	Roxborough bridge	9·7
Havering	A118 Romford relief road stage 1	11·1
Kensington and Chelsea, Westminster	Harrow road/Ladbroke Grove	3·1
Kingston	Town centre relief road	22·8
Merton	Mitcham town centre	4·5
	Church road, Mitcham	7·2
Newham	Docks cut route	3·7
	High street/Romford road junction	0·8
Redbridge	A118 diversion	3·9
Southwark	Old Kent road/Albany road	3·0
	Old Kent road/Canal bridge	4·4
Sutton	Town centre gyratory	2·2
Waltham Forest	Hoe street/Selbourne road	2·4
Wandsworth	Wangas estate relief road	4·3
	York road improvement	3·0
	Nine Elms lane improvement	2·3

Proposals for 1987-88 include continued support for these schemes and support for a further seven schemes worth £61 million.

This year TSG is helping important borough programmes of minor improvement schemes and traffic management measures worth £10 million. These should benefit all classes of traffic and reduce accidents. We propose to accept for grant £16 million of schemes of this sort in 1987-88.

Driving Tests

39. Mr. Stevens asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking to reduce the waiting time for driving tests.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have been acting to reduce the waiting lists for driving tests. The number of examiners has been increased by 180 — 14 per cent. — since the beginning of 1985. Queues for tests have been brought down on average from 18 weeks to 15 weeks. They are still too long. We aim by continuing recruitment of examiners to reduce the average to 11 weeks this year.

River Crossing (Dartford)

40. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Transport when work is expected to begin on the proposed third river crossing at Dartford.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Construction of the new crossing is expected to begin early in 1988 subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary legislation.

National Bus Company

41. Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many National Bus Company subsidiaries have been sold to their managers.

Mr. David Mitchell: Of the 13 National Bus Company subsidiaries which have so far been privatised, 12 have been bought out by their own managements. In most cases employees are being given the opportunity to acquire shares in the businesses.

Bus Services

42. Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for Transport what impact he expects the full deregulation of bus services on 25 January 1987 to have on fare levels.

48. Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Transport by how much he expects the costs of public transport to change once the effects of over registration of commercial services under the Transport Act 1985 have been removed.

Mr. David Mitchell: The long-term effect of introducing competition into local bus services will be to make their costs lower than they would otherwise have been. This saving will be split between the passenger and the ratepayer in varying proportion.

45. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of the extent of over-registration of bus services under the Transport Act 1985.

47. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Transport what indications he has as to likely changes in the level of commercial registration of bus services after 25 January 1987.

Mr. David Mitchell: It is now clear that there will be little change in the overall level of bus services on 26 January. Indeed, the number of new services registered to start on that date is larger than the number of services withdrawn.

50. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the effects of the deregulation of the bus services under the Transport Act 1985.

Mr. David Mitchell: Deregulation and the introduction of competition have enabled local authorities overall to make substantial savings in subsidy to operators from the rates. Service levels have been broadly maintained with a few exceptions and improved in many places, particularly through the introduction of minibuses, which are now operating in over 150 towns and cities throughout the country.

Rail Fares

43. Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent discussions he has had with the chairman of British Rail concerning fare increases.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend has had several discussions with the chairman of British Rail recently, some of which have touched on fares.

44. Mr. Bagier asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assumptions were made as to the likely implications for fare levels when his Department set the financial framework for British Rail for 1987-88.

Mr. David Mitchell: The cash ceiling for the 1987-88 PSO grant has not yet been set; but BR's external financing limit for that year was announced in the Chancellor's autumn statement. It is for BR to decide on the level and pattern of fares in the light of the EFL and of the general objectives my right hon. Friend has given it.

46. Mr. Ron Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria he proposes to use in deciding whether British Rail fare increases to fund enhancements in the quality of the service and increases in investment are minor and modest; and if he will make a statement.

49. Mr. David Mitchell: Fares increases are a matter for British Rail. Where fares are raised to reflect improved quality or enhanced investment, I am sure the board will want to consider both the cost of the improvements and the need to retain the custom of passengers.

Scotland (Highlands Region)

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he is currently considering for the improvement of communications between the Highlands region of Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. David Mitchell: The board of British Rail has not put any proposals to me.

EC (United Kingdom Presidency)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the achievements of the United Kingdom's presidency of the European Community Council of Ministers in respect of transport.

Mr. Moore: Substantial progress was made during the United Kingdom presidency on a number of important transport issues. The Council took a notable step forward in maritime transport by reaching agreement on four regulations which lay the foundations of a common shipping policy. These measures will liberalise the Community's international trades, establish a competition regime for shipping and enable the Community to take concerted action to combat protectionism from third countries and to counter unfair pricing practices particularly from state trading lines. The liberalisation of the Community's international trades is particularly significant. The regulation provides for the phasing out by the end of 1992 of unilateral cargo reservation laws and discriminatory cargo sharing arrangements in bilateral agreements, establishing freedom to provide services to and from, and between member states. The Council agreed furthermore to build on this achievment by moving straight to the development of further important measures aimed at both the harmonisation of state aids and ways of strengthening the ability of the Community shipping industry to face the challenge of the highly competitive international shipping market.

On air transport, significant progress was made on a package of measures for a three-year first step towards the 1992 target date for full liberalisation. We obtained unanimous support for our proposals on capacity and a substantial majority for our ideas on market access. A growing number of member states—seven so far—now recognise the importance of allowing cheaper fares. This is a considerable achievement and puts the Belgian presidency in a commanding position to complete a worthwhile first stage package.

On inland transport, the Council agreed to increase each member state's quota of Community road haulage permits by 15 per cent. in 1987. A proposal for a further increase of up to 40 per cent. for 1987 could not be adopted partly because the European Parliament had not issued an opinion, but adoption should be possible early in the Belgian presidency. The Council also agreed a regulation allocating 90 million ecu — about £66 million — to transport infrastructure projects in member states, including two in the United Kingdom. Directives were adopted to streamline procedures for goods traffic at intra-Community frontiers and to ease restrictions on certain combined transport operations. The Council also agreed a framework for future Community policy on railway finances and asked the Commission to prepare a report on port finances with a view to ensuring greater transparency of port accounts.

A1-M1 Link (Battle of Naseby)

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received notice of historical evidence to indicate the site and extent of the main battle area of the battle of Naseby; which historians and other experts have supplied such evidence; what indication the evidence so supplied has given as to the extent to which the proposed A1-M1 link road would cut through the site of the main battle area; and whether he will place that evidence, together with any relevant plans and maps, in the Library before he reaches his conclusions on the report of the Inspector who conducted the inquiry into the proposals for that link road.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The issue was debated at length at the public inquiry. Those who gave evidence included Mr. William Seymour, Brigadier Peter Young, Mr. David Chandler, Professor Austin Woolrych and Colonel H. C. B. Rogers. The inspector's report has been received and my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Transport must now be allowed to reach a decision in the light of the evidence and of the inspector's recommendations. They hope to be able to announce their decision next month. Copies of the inspector's report and of appended documents will be made available in the usual way.

A46 (Road Accidents)

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents occurred on the stretch of the A46 between Lincoln and Newark in each of the last five years; and how many people were injured and killed in these accidents.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Details of the accident record and casualties on the A46 trunk road between Lincoln city and Newark boundaries since 1981 are as follows:

Accident record: A46 between Lincoln and Newark from November 1981 to October 1986

Channel Tunnel

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the potential employment benefits of (a) the Channel tunnel rail-link and (b) the Channel tunnel rail terminal at Waterloo; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The investments which BR plans to make in providing passenger and freight services through the Channel tunnel will generate additional employment, both at the construction phase and in the operation of through rail services when the tunnel is opened. BR estimates that the following new jobs will be created:

(i) construction of fixed works (from mid-1988 to mid-1993): about 1,650 jobs per annum.
(ii) construction of rolling stock (from early 1988 to mid-1992): about 2,200 jobs per annum.
(iii) operational phase (from mid-1993): about 1,500 jobs in the first year of operation, increasing as the level of services expands in subsequent years.

These totals include jobs which are likely to be created at the proposed Waterloo terminal. BR estimates these at about 350 per annum during the constructional phase, and about 550 in the first year of operation.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Seafarers (Training)

Sir Paul Bryan asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table in the Official Report listing those educational establishments approved by his Department in the United Kingdom offering courses relevant to the training of professional seafarers, the type of course available at each, the number of students undertaking such courses at the most recent available date and in 1980 and the proportion of such students which he estimates to be of British nationality.

Mr. Walden: Information in the form requested is not readily available.

Advanced courses in public sector further and higher education in England are required to be approved individually by the Secretary of State. There is no corresponding power or requirement for the approval of institutions or for non-advanced courses.

The following table lists enrolments on courses in nautical science and marine engineering in public sector further and higher education establishments covered by the Department's annual further education statistical record. Figures on nationality are not available and the table therefore shows the percentage of students whose domicile was in the United Kingdom. Enrolments on non-advanced Department of Transport certificate courses in nautical science increased mainly due to extra take-up on courses in basic sea survival and first aid.

Few of these students were from overseas.

Information for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland is the responsibility of the Secretaries of State for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

City Technical Colleges

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many (a) business and industrialists (b) local authorities (c) educational institutions and charities and (d) other potential sponsors have been contacted by his office with proposals for the establishment of city technology colleges.

Mrs. Rumbold: My Department initially contacted some 1,800 companies, all English local education authorities, some 200 charitable organisations and a wide variety of other organisations with an interest in education. Since the announcement of the proposal in October, the Department has had a considerable number of contacts with many organisations and interested individuals, and these discussions are continuing.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the educational institutions, churches, trade unions and other non-commercial organisations that his Department contacted with details of the establishment of city technology colleges.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend initially informed local education authorities in England, leading religious educational bodies, teacher trade unions and a number of other organisations of his proposals for the establishment of city technology colleges. Since the original announcement the Department has had further contacts with some of these bodies.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what will be the current costs per year of a city technology college; and what proportion of these costs will be on staff salaries.

Mrs. Rumbold: At current prices it is estimated that the annual current cost of a city technology college will be of the order of £1·1 million to £1·8 million, depending on local circumstances. The breakdown of actual costs will depend on decisions to be taken by the promoters of CTCs. If they are in line with the present practice of local education authorities we would estimate that 80 per cent. of annual current expenditure would go on staff costs.

GCSE

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he intends to make funding available for the introduction of GCSE into post-school education; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: It is for local authorities to determine the resources made available for GCSE provision, whether in schools or in further education. The Government's plans for 1987-88 provide for an increase of 18·8 per cent. in total local authority expenditure compared with the current year; of this some £100 million is intended for GCSE non-teaching costs.

In addition, the Government have directed substantial resources specifically to help meet GCSE-related costs, including £25 million for in-service training for teachers in schools and further education in the financial years 1985-86 to 1987-88; and support for local authority expenditure on books and equipment in schools through education support grants and the Manpower Services Commission in the financial years 1986-87 and 1987-88.

The available resources should enable authorities to ensure that maintained institutions offering GCSE courses can meet the demands of the new examination courses.

CERN

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the financing of the British contribution to CERN.

Mr. Walden: The United Kingdom contribution to CERN budget for the calendar year 1987 is 126·65 million Swiss francs. Provision for the sterling equivalent of this sum will be included in the 1987-88 Estimates for the Science and Engineering Research Council, which will be presented to Parliament in due course.

Teachers Unions

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his latest information as to which of the teachers' unions agree with the employers' side majority proposals; and which do not.

Mrs. Rumbold: I understand that at the Burnham committee meeting of 7 January only two unions—the NUT and AMMA—confirmed their wish to adopt the proposals made by the majority on the employer's side. The remaining unions—NAS/UWT, NAHT, SHA and PAT—did not. This compares with the four unions which signed the ACAS document on teachers' pay and conditions after the Nottingham/London talks in November, and the five unions which signed the Coventry heads of agreement in July 1986.

ILEA

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the leader of the Inner London Education Authority; and what issues were discussed.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend, the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) met a deputation on 10 February 1986 led by the leader of the Inner London Education Authority to discuss the authority's precept limit for 1986-87.

Secondary Education

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, in considering the proposed re-organisation of secondary education in West Essex, he will take into account the representations he has received in favour of single sex education and objections to the tertiary college system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Yes. My right hon. Friend will take into account all relevant factors, including the representations and objections that he has received, in his consideration of the statutory proposals.

AIDS

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the chairman of the Medical Research Council's working party on AIDS seeking more resources for AIDS research.

Mr. Walden: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply of 18 December 1986 to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South West (Mrs. Bottomley) (cols. 666-67) in which he announced that the Medical Research Council is to receive an increase in its grant-in-aid of £1 million a year for AIDS research. That addition is to take effect from 1987-88. Since then my right hon. Friend has discussed the programme of work with the secretary of the Medical Research Council.

Corporal Punishment

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he intends to make an order relating to sections 47(5)(a)(iii) and 47(7) of the Education (No. 2) Act 1986 concerning corporal punishment in schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend intends to make regulations under section 47(5)(a)(iii) well in advance of the 1987-88 school year. He has no present plans to make regulations under section 47(7).

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many pupils fall under sections 47(6)(a), 47(6)(b) and 47(6)(c) of the Education (No. 2) Act 1986 concerning corporal punishment; and how many schools have one or more pupils who are covered by these categories.

Mrs. Rumbold: About 33,000 pupils at 234 schools in England and Wales are likely to come within the terms of section 47(6)(a). Under section 47(6)(b) we expect that there will be some 500 pupils at the five music and ballet schools in England; the number of pupils placed in independent schools by local education authorities at January 1985, the latest date for which information is available, was about 15,000. The Department has no information about the number of pupils or schools coming within the scope of section 47(6)(c).

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many pupils fall under section 47(5)(b) of the Education (No. 2) Act 1986 concerning corporal punishment.

Mrs. Rumbold: This information is not collected centrally.

Students

Mrs. Shields asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students left the education system without any qualifications at O level or CSE in 1985-86; and what are the comparable figures for each of the countries in the EEC.

Mr. Dunn: Figures for 1985-86 are not yet available. In 1984-85 it is estimated that 9·4 per cent. of school leavers (69,400) in England left with no O level or CSE qualifications; some of these young people will subsequently have gained qualifications in further education colleges or on the youth training scheme.

Information is not yet available to draw comparable international comparisons in this area.

Teachers (Unions and Employers)

Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the latest position regarding negotiations with the teaching unions and the teachers' employers.

Mrs. Rumbold: The local authority employers and teacher unions met on 7 January in the Burnham and CLEA/ST committees. I understand that a majority on each side, but with significant dissenting voices, expressed a wish to adopt the ACAS document of November 1986 if the Government are willing to fund the package contained therein. My right hon. Friend expects to receive formal communications on this subject which he will consider carefully. However his position remains that he intends to see a satisfactory career structure for teachers implemented within the substantial resources which the Government have made available.

Maintained Schools

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the percentage of children aged three to four years attending any form of maintained school, at the latest date, for each local authority.

Mr. Dunn: The percentages of children aged three and four attending maintained schools in each local educattion authority in England in January 1986, the latest date for which figures are available is given below:

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the number of children aged three to four years attending any form of maintained school at the latest date; what proportion of the total this represents; and how that compares with each of the last five years.

Mr. Dunn: The number and proportion of children aged three and four attending maintained schools in England in January 1986, the latest date for which figures are available, and for the preceding five years was as follows:

January each year	Number of children attending maintained schools[1]	Percentage[2]

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the expenditure on all maintained schools for under-fives for each of the last five years.

Mr. Dunn: The net recurrent expenditure by local education authorities on under fives in maintained schools for each of the last five years is as follows:

	£ million cash
1981-82	241
1982-83	274
1983-84	296

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of children aged three to four-years-old attended maintained schools in the United Kingdom at the latest date, compared with other Organisation of Economic Co-operation and Development countries.

Mr. Dunn: A study on this topic has recently been published in "Statistical Bulletin 16/86", a copy of which is in the Library.

The table below summarises the available information on both education and on day care (excluding child minders) covering both public and private sectors. Statistics are presented in that form because the division between categories is blurred by differing departmental responsibilities in different countries and by differing levels of Government subsidy to the private sector. Rates for both three to four, and three to five year olds are shown because compulsory schooling starts at age six or seven in the other countries.

Pre-School Education

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the number and percentage of three to four-year-olds having some form of pre-school education in the private, maintained or voluntary sector.

Mr. Dunn: The number and percentage of three and four year olds in England in January 1986 who were having pre-school education in the private or maintained sectors are given below. Information on pre-school education in the voluntary sector is not collected centrally.

	Pupils aged 3 and 4[1]	Percentage[2]

Voluntary Sector

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the Government funding, direct and indirect, for the voluntary sector of under-five education for each of the last five years.

Mr. Dunn: Some LEA expenditure supported through RSG will, over this period, have been directed to provision for under fives in voluntary schools but no breakdown of the amounts involved is available.

Nursery Schools

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the number of children aged three to four years attending nursery schools at the latest date, broken down for each local authority; and what was the number for the last five years.

Mr. Dunn: The number of children aged three or four attending maintained nursery schools in each local education authority in England in January 1986 (the latest date for which figures are available) and for the preceding five years is given in the table below. Pupils aged three or four in nursery classes in maintained primary schools have been excluded from these figures.

Disabled Students

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students in each of the universities and institutions of higher education in England and Wales are registered disabled; and what proportion they represent of the student population (a) in England, (b) in Wales and (c) in England and Wales.

Mr. Walden: As I explained in my reply on 18 November to the hon. Member for Stoke on Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) at columns 137-38, information on disabled students in higher education is not available routinely. However, in 1985 a survey of students with special educational needs was carried out, covering public sector higher education and non-advanced further education in England. The survey estimated that there were some 600 students in public sector higher education who had special educational needs which required additional support or equipment. This represents about 15 per 10,000 students in public sector higher education.

The Open University had just over 2,000 disabled students (3 per cent. of all students) in the undergraduate programme at the start of 1986. Information is not collected for other universities.

Information for individual institutions could only be released with their consent and at disproportionate cost.

Public sector higher education in Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

ENVIRONMENT

EC (Environment Policy)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the achievements of the United Kingdom's presidency of the European Community Council of Ministers in respect of environment matters.

Mr. Waldegrave: I chaired the Council of Environment Ministers during the United Kingdom Presidency. At our meeting on 24 November the Council reached agreement on three important directives — motorcycle noise, environmental pollution by asbestos, and the disposal of waste oil. Two other measures, on animal experimentation and on the exchange of information about water quality, were formally adopted. We also adopted resolutions on the Rhine pollution incidents and the fourth environment action programme. Good progress was made on other subjects under discussion. Details of the Council were given in my reply of 27 November 1986 to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire.

The United Kingdom also hosted a successful meeting of the steering committee for the European Year of the Environment in London on 8 December.

A full list of United Kingdom Presidency achievements will be placed in the Library of the House.

Local Government Act 1974

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations have been received by his Department from the Commission for Local Administration about changes in the Local Government Act 1974.

Dr. Boyson: The Commission for Local Adminstration in England submitted review documents to central Government in 1978, 1980 and 1984, formally proposing changes in the 1974 Act. The text of those submissions and of the Government's responses were published in the Commissions annual reports, copies of which are deposited in the Library. The Commission also submitted to the Department its comments on proposals for change made in 1986 by the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Adminstration, and the Widdicombe committee of inquiry into the conduct of local government business. The Government are considering those comments in association with the many others that they have received.

Ealing Council

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment upon what evidence the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) based his statement of 19 November, Official Report, column 560, concerning the policy and expenditure of Ealing council in relation to the homosexual community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I did not say anything about expenditure on the homosexual community. As for the policies, these are well documented.

Camden Council

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment upon what evidence the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) based his statement of 17 December, Official Report, column 1185, concerning the policy of Camden council towards the removal of graffiti; and if he willl make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I understand that a spokesman for Camden borough council has acknowledged that the council give priority to the removal of graffiti of a racists or sexist nature.

ENVIRONMENT

Fluoridation

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the fluoridation schemes which have been put into operation in the United Kingdom since the Water (Fluoridation) Act 1985 was passed and give the cost of those schemes and the number of the populations now affected by them.

Mr. John Patten: Information about fluoridation schemes which have been put into operation in the United Kingdom since the passing of the Water (Fluoridation) Act 1985 is listed below:

Radioactive Waste

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the target level for maximum annual radiation exposure of any member of the public to be used by his Department in considering an application for a radioactive waste disposal facility, expressed in millisieverts per year; and when this target level was defined.

Mr. Waldegrave: The target applicable to a single repository at any one time is a risk to an individual in a year equivalent to that associated with a dose of 0·1 mSv. This target was defined in "Disposal Facilities on land for Low and Intermediate Level Radioactive Wastes: Principles for the Protection of the Human Environment", published by HMSO in December 1984.

Rates

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about regional variations in levels of rates, and specifically between London boroughs and county councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I shall answer this question shortly.

Nuclear Radiation

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a list showing the various critical groups of members of the public likely to be exposed to the greatest doses of radiation in the vicinity of each licensed nuclear installation for the several kinds of radioactive discharges and emissions during normal operations of the installation; whether, in each case, the critical group is associated with (a) direct emissions of radiation from the installation; (b) gaseous discharges of radioactive waste from the installation; (c) liquid discharges of radioactive waste from the installation and (d) any other source of man-made radiation; whether, at each site, an individual may be a member of more than one critical group; what scientific method is adopted for individuals being members of more than one critical group; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Housing

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his Department's current estimate of the level of capital expenditure annually required (i) to reverse and (ii) to maintain the current rate of deterioration in the state of repair of the nation's (a) public and (b) private housing stock.

Mr. Tracey: It is difficult to establish meaningful global estimates of this sort. Primary responsibility for deciding how much to spend on maintaining their houses must rest with the property owners.

Homelessness

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy on alleviating homelessness in the light of Professor John Grieve's recent report on homelessness in Greater London, a copy of which has been sent to him; and what is his estimate of the comparative public sector costs of housing homeless families in London by (i) providing them with newly built council dwellings, (ii) providing them with dwellings acquired from the private sector and improved for letting and (iii) providing them with bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

Mr. John Patten: I shall answer this question shortly.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the estimated (a) net expenditure and (b) gross expenditure on bed-and-breakfast accommodation for homeless households recorded by local authorities on his Department's RO4 forms for the financial year 1985-86; and if he will give this information for England as a whole, and for each local authority area.

Mr. Tracey: I have today placed the information available in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the report entitled "Homeless Young People in Britain: The Contribution of the Private Sector," a copy of which has been sent to him by Duncan Guthrie, the director of the disabilities study unit; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: I shall answer this question shortly.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to combat the rise in homelessness and bad housing conditions; and if he will make a statement on the recent launch of the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless 1987.

Mr. John Patten: I shall answer this question shortly.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many people have been accepted as homeless by each London borough council in 1978 and in each subsequent year;

(2) how many people accepted as homeless were housed in bed-and-breakfast, other temporal accommodation or in permanent accommodation, respectively, by each London borough council in 1978 and in each year since.

Mr. Tracey: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Enterprise Zones

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement of the progress to date of each of the enterprise zones.

Mr. John Patten: I refer my hon. Friend to the report, "Enterprise Zone Information 1984-85", published by my Department on 22 October 1986, copies of which were placed in the Library.

Pollution

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning pollution in rivers and canals in Leicestershire.

Mr. Waldegrave: Following an incident affecting the river Soar, my right hon. Friend received a number of representations last year about powers to control water pollution. However as I indicated in my answer on 17 December 1986 at column 580, the existing powers for dealing with pollution in rivers and canals are generally considered adequate. The condition of rivers and canals in the Severn Trent water authority area was described in the recently published report, "River Quality in England and Wales 1985". This showed a net improvement in quality since 1980.

Farm Buildings (Planning Controls)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland, Official Report, 17 December, column 592, he will indicate the clarification he has given in reply to the representations received about his proposals to extend planning controls to new livestock buildings and associated structures.

Mr. Tracey: I shall answer this question shortly.

Housing Subsidy

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total amount of housing subsidy paid in each of the years 1983-84 to 1986-87 in respect of housing schemes for which his Department's project control approval has been given and which have been financed by financial facilities negotiated by the authorities separate from borrowing under the authorities' housing investment programme allocations.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not available. Admissible costs for subsidy purposes relate to capital expenditure undertaken by an authority, irrespective of the methods used to finance that expenditure.

North Bedfordshire Borough Council

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State has yet replied to the letter dated 15 December from North Bedfordshire borough council; and if he will reconsider his decision not to meet representatives of the council.

Mr. John Patten: I shall write to the hon. Member.

AIDS

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice he gives to local councils on the priority to be attached to spending money on local campaigns to warn people of the dangers of AIDS.

Mr. Ridley: It is for local authorities to assess their own priorities for expenditure.

Pollution Inspectorate (Director)

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce the appointment of a director for Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution; what technical qualifications he proposes to require of the new director; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to the reply, 1 December 1986, c. 523]: I announced the Government's decision to form Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution within my Department and the Welsh Office on 7 August 1986 and, on 3 December, I placed in the Library of the House copies of the scrutiny report on Government pollution and safety inspection together with the Departments' action plan on that report. I am now able to announce the name of the director designate of the new inspectorate.

I have decided that the inspectorate should be headed, initially, by an experienced senior administrator and I am therefore appointing Mr. Brian Ponsford who is currently the director of waste disposal in my Department, to be the director of the inspectorate with effect from 1 April. Mr. Ponsford will be supported by a chief inspector, radioactive substances and by a chief inspector, air, water and wastes.

These appointments will be made with the agreement of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. When the initial managerial and organisational tasks of setting the inspectorate up have been completed, it is our intention that subsequent appointments to head the inspectorate should be made after open competition.

I am presently consulting interested bodies about detailed plans for the inspectorate's organisation and functions.

I believe that the formation of the inspectorate will result in clearer and stronger enironmental control, in taxpayers receiving better value for their money than from the present disperate arrangements, and in industry benefiting from the co-ordinated approach which the inspectorate will have the capacity to develop.

Green Belt (Shopping and Leisure Centres)

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the Government's policy towards applications to build large shopping and leisure centres in the green belt.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 18 December 1986, c. 688]: Policy on green belts remains as set out in DOE circular 14/84. My right hon. Friend and I have made it clear that large new shopping and leisure centres do not belong in green belts. When I spoke on 14 October to a conference organised by the Confederation of British Industry, entitled "The Future of Shopping—In or Out of Town?" I said:

"Hardly a week goes by without our reading in the press of yet another vast shopping centre — or more often a shopping and leisure complex — which it is proposed to build in the middle of the green belt. Any such proposal has, of course, to be considered on its merits and in the light of general policy. Some may come to me on appeal, so I must not name names. There is provision, as there must be, for exceptions to be made in very special circumstances. But by way of general policy I would say that the promoters of some of the wilder schemes have no reason to think that they will succeed in breaching green belt policy. We are certainly not opposed to new methods of retailing and the benefits that modern retail stores can bring to the customer. But they do not belong in the green belt. Let that be understood."

I also announced that we proposed to issue a direction requiring local planning authorities to consult the Department before granting permission for certain large new retail stores.

That direction was issued on Thursday 18 December 1986 as an annex to a circular entitled, "Policy on Major Retail Developments" published by HMSO on behalf of my Department and the Welsh Office. A copy of the circular (21/86, Welsh Office 58/86), which also repeats Government policy on planning and large new retail developments, has been placed in the Library.

The direction which is made under articles 10 and 15(4) of the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1977, requires local planning authorities to consult my Department, or in Wales, the Welsh Office, before approving any development which consists of or includes gross retail floorspace of 250,000 sq feet (23,325 sq metres) or more. It will apply to all relevant planning applications not determined and for which no appeal against non-determination has been made by 1 January 1987. It will apply also to proposals for which local authorities seek "deemed" planning permission under the general regulations.

The direction also specifies the information which local planning authorities are required to provide to the department when carrying out the necessary consultation and prevents the local authority from granting planning permission on the application (or resolving to carry it out) for 21 days. If at the end of that time they have received no further direction from the Secretary of State restricting permission or requiring reference of the application to him. They may proceed to grant permission. It is, however, open to the authority to turn down such an application without reference to the Department.

The existing directions relating to the handling of applications which represent departures from development plans remain in force. However, the request of the Secretaries of State to be informed by local authorities of planning applications for shopping developments outside existing city, town or district centres, involving gross floorspace of 100,000 sq feet or more, is cancelled by the new circular.

In making the direction, we recognise that some major retail schemes now in the planning stage or in prospect raise very wide planning issues which will have effects far beyond the boundaries of an individual planning authority and which in many cases local authorities may find difficult to deal with. We consider it right that we should have a clear opportunity to consider whether such schemes should be called-in for determination by the Secretary of State, although the decision as to whether call-in is appropriate will be taken in the light of the individual circumstances.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a table showing the planned expenditure on the various activities of the common agricultural policy in 1987 before and after the agreement of the Council on 16 December in such a way as to demonstrate the manner in which the saving of £1,200 million in planned expenditure in 1987 is to be achieved.

Mr. Jopling: The Community's draft budget for 1987 includes the following provisions for the common agricultural policy:

EAGGF Guarantee	23,003
EAGGF Guidance	1,000
Other CAP expenditure	171
TOTAL	24,174

The decisions taken by the Council on 16 December, including the programme for disposal of butter stocks with delayed reimbursement to member states, will affect 1987 expenditure as follows:

	mecu
Milk
Lower stocks	−135
Reducation in receipts of coresponsibility levy	+20
Slaughtering of dairy cows (effect on beef sector)	+195
Deferred reimbursement for disposals	−1,050

	mecu
Beef (excluding effects of reforms in milk sector)	– 50
Green rate changes	+ 80
Overall effect	– 940

These figures do not take account of the revised social butter scheme, the effects of which will depend on uptake by member states, or of restrictions on intervention for dairy products on which the Council undertook to take further decisions by the end of February 1987.

The overall savings of 940 mecu—£650 million—are expected to be used to offset other areas of guarantee expenditure where the provision in the 1987 draft budget is likely to be inadequate. The figure of £1,200 million quoted by my hon. Friend is the estimated total saving resulting from the milk package over three years.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the current levels of import levy on the food products covered by the common agricultural policy; and what were the comparable levels around the same date in each of the previous five years.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The information requested is set out in the table for the main commodities. The levies shown have been adjusted for the United Kingdom monetary compensatory amounts.

Import levies[1] applicable in the United Kingdom for the main food items covered by the common agricultural policy: third Wednesday in December, 1981-1986

£ tonne

	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986
Common wheat	50	71	51	41	78	116
Barley	48	67	43	44	81	112
Maize	66	69	40	44	65	103
Rice	166	280	267	319	375	421
Sugar (white)[2]	184	251	243	290	289	313
Olive oil	186	186	374	346	476	313
Butter[3]	948	990	1,348	1,185	1,497	1,749
SMP	425	483	572	659	936	939
Beef and veal[4]	999	1,234	1,393	1,442	1,504	1,253
Pigmeat	265	346	341	246	316	524
Poultrymeat	149	199	157	137	172	280
Eggs	159	212	176	149	186	310

Notes:

All figures have been rounded to the nearest £.

[1] The rates of levy vary for different tariff headings. The rates quoted are: beef and veal—carcase; pigmeat—carcase; poultrymeat—70 per cent., chickens; rice—wholly milled long grain; olive oil—virgin; eggs in shell. Levies are shown after adjustment for the UK monetary compensatory amounts where applicable.

[2] In practice the United Kingdom's imports from third countries are normally covered by the Lomé convention and enter the Community levy free.

[3] A special lower rate of levy is applicable to imports of butter from New Zealand.

[4] Most imports of beef from third countries are subject to special arrangements allowing entry at reduced levy rates.

Food Surpluses

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will outline the implications for the disposal of food surpluses of the new national flexibility referred to by the Minister of State in the House on 17 December; if this involves any transfer of responsibilities for funding the disposal of surpluses from the European Community to member states; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I did not make any reference to national flexibility on the disposal of food surpluses on 17 December. The outcome of the Council on this point was explained in my statement, Official Report, column 1211. The question of financial responsibility was dealt with in my reply to my hon. Friend of 19 December 1986 at column 832.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the cost of disposal of surpluses within the European Economic Community in the most recent annual period for which figures are available.

Mr. Gummer: Community expenditure in 1985 on the disposal of products in structural surplus — cereals, sugar, wine, beef and milk products—was 8939 mecu.

Surplus Stocks

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the current levels of the surplus stocks of European Economic Community foodstuffs and wine in private and public storage at the most recent date for which figures are available.

Mr. Gummer: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) on 19 December 1986, at column 827.

Food Sales (Intervention Stocks)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if member states will be required to notify the Commission of the prices at which foodstuffs are sold from intervention stocks to particular destinations under the arrangements agreed at the Council meeting on 16 December; and if the member states concerned will require to accept any financial responsibility for such sales.

Mr. Gummer: The Council did not agree any specific stock disposal measures but took note, with approval, of a Commission paper outlining certain plans for the disposal of butter stocks, the details of which have still to be determined. In accordance with normal practice, the Commission itself is responsible for setting prices for sales out of intervention, in the light of the advice of the appropriate management committee. The question of financial responsibility was dealt with in my reply to my hon. Friend on 19 December 1986 at column 832.

Milk Producers (Compensation Scheme)

Mr. Speller asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will seek powers to top up from national funds the European Community compensation scheme for milk producers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The Council of Agriculture Ministers meeting in December agreed to increase the rate of compensation for the Community outgoers scheme by 50 per cent. to a total of 27·5p per litre. I see no justification for topping up beyond this level. I believe the new rate will make the scheme significantly more attractive.

Council of Agriculture Ministers

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the achievements of the United Kingdom's presidency of the European Community Council of Agriculture Ministers.

Mr. Jopling: The principal achievement was the progress made at the December Council in reforming the common agricultural policy, as reported fully to the House by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, on 16 December at columns 1211-4. Other achievements are listed in a document being placed in the Library by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

European Community (Production)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the degree of self-sufficiency in each member country of the European Economic Community in the production of milk, beef, wheat, barley, lamb, olive oil and wine.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Information on self-sufficiency in the main agricultural products is contained in the Commission publication "The Agricultural Situation in the Community—1985 Report", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Figures for Spain, Portugal and the Community as a whole are given on page 54. Information for other member states is summarised on pages 249 and 250.

Irradiated Foods

Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the outcome of his consideration of the report on safety and wholesomeness of irradiated foods by the Advisory Committee on Irradiated and Novel Foods.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to him by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Services earlier today.

WALES

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a list of area health boards in rank order according to the number of patients awaiting treatment in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The following tables show the health authorities in Wales ranked according to the numbers of in-patients and according to the numbers of out-patients on hospital waiting lists at 30 June 1986:

Number of in-patients

	Number
Powys	70
Gwynedd	2,013
East Dyfed	2,101
Pembrokeshire	2,794
Clwyd	4,872
West Glamorgan	4,955
South Glamorgan	7,764
Gwent	7,998
Mid Glamorgan	9,090

Number of out-patients

	Number
Powys	654
Pembrokeshire	2,156
Gwynedd	4,145
East Dyfed	5,648
Clwyd	8,822
Gwent	11,359
South Glamorgan	16,239
Mid Glamorgan	18,393

I am concerned at the length of time some people have to wait for hospital treatment in Wales and my officials are working closely with district health authorities to help them find ways of solving the problem. One million pounds has been distributed for 1986-87 and a further £1 million will be made available in 1987-88 to make an immediate impact on the worst bottlenecks.

Monument Clearance

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what consultation procedures apply to a scheduled monument clearance determination; and what experts or organisations his consultations have to involve before a determination can be made.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I would refer the hon. Gentleman to my letter of 7 January 1987, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Housing Condition Survey

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 5 December, Official Report, column 805, what guidance with regard to the protection of the confidentiality of personal information is given to members of his staff; to what level of juniority such guidance is issued; and if he is satisfied with the operation of this guidance within his Department.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: All permanent, casual and agency staff at all levels employed by the Department are required to sign the Official Secrets Act. This applies also to retiring civil servants. Every permanent member of staff receives on joining the Department a copy of a handbook for the new civil servant which contains guidance on such matters as the Official Secrets Act and security. All staff are also given a copy of the Department's security rules which draws attention to the Department's handbook and the advice given there on the disclosure of official information.

Beef Farmers (Compensation)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of Wales if he will give details of the pension and compensation package which will be available to beef farmers in Wales who convert their land to other use.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food made a statement on 17 December 1986 on the outcome of the meeting of the Council of Agricultural Ministers in Brussels between 13 and 16 December 1986.

The Council agreed a package of measures for the beef sector including the retention in the United Kingdom of the beef variable premium for a further two years. This will be of particular benefit to our beef farmers and provide an important element of stability.

At the same meeting the Council broadly approved in outline a package of socio-structural measures. This will be of interest to all farmers—including those in beef production—and, if agreed, will involve a pre-pension scheme linked to the non-cultivation of agricultural land. Detailed decisions on the precise nature of the package have yet to be taken but these are expected to be made in the next few weeks.

Diabetics

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will undertake a study into the possible adverse effects of multiple use of needles and syringes supplied to children suffering from diabetes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: We have no plans to undertake such a study. However, the current arrangements for the supply of disposable syringes on the National Health Service have recently been the subject of discussion between Health Departments and the British Diabetic Association.

Homelessness

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Wales what consideration he has given to the report entitled "Homeless Young People in Britain: The Contribution of the Private Sector", a copy of which has been sent to him by Duncan Guthrie, the director of the disabilities study unit; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: We have recently received a copy of the report which we will study carefully.

Education (Expenditure)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much was spent per pupil in secondary schools in Wales in the most recent year for which figures are available; and what was the comparable figure for 1980-81 at constant figures.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In 1985-86 the amount spent per pupil in secondary schools in Wales was £1,158. The equivalent figure for 1980-81 was £1,041.

Cancer Statistics

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many women died of cervical cancer and breast cancer, respectively, in each health district in 1978 and each year since, giving separately the number of women who died who were over 50 years of age.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The exact information requested is not readily available. The following table shows the number of deaths for women of all ages and for those aged 45 and over:

	Age group	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985

EMPLOYMENT

Benefits (Payment Delays)

Mrs. Beckett asked the Paymaster General how many applications for judicial review are currently in process regarding delays in payment of benefits by his Department.

Mr. Lee: None.

Free Trade and Enterprise Zones

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Paymaster General if he will estimate the effect on employment prospects of (a) the free trade zones and (b) the enterprise zones.

Mr. Lee: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Labour Statistics

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Paymaster General what was the total number of persons in (a) employment and (b) self-employment at the latest date for which figures are available; and what are the comparable figures for (i) 1983, (ii) 1979 and (iii) 1974.

Mr. Lee: The information is as follows:

Employment in Great Britain[1]

Thousand

	Employees in employment	Self-employed	Employed labour force
June 1974	22,297	1,935	24,577
June 1979	22,638	1,842	24,794
June 1983	20,572	2,160	23,054
June 1986	21,070	2,665	24,056

[1] The sum of employees in employment, the self-employed and HM Forces.

Mr. Meacher asked the Paymaster General (1) what is the percentage in each social class I to V who are unemployed; and by how much has each of these percentages changed since 1979;

(2) what are the latest figures for the unemployment rate for each of the social classes I to V; and what were the corresponding rates in 1979.

Mr. Lee: The available information which comes from the labour force survey is shown in the table below:

Numbers of people without a job and actively looking for work as a percentage of those economically active in each group
Great Britain

Previous social class	Spring 1979 per cent.	Spring 1985 per cent.	Change per cent.
I. Professional etc. occupations	[1]	1·5	[1]
II. Intermediate occupations	1·6	3·5	+1·9
III. Skilled occupations	3·0	6·7	+3·7
IV. Partly skilled occupations	5·2	9·6	+4·4
V. Unskilled occupations	8·2	12·7	+4·5
Not classfied[3]	[2]	[2]	[2]
All unemployed	5·6	10·6	+5·0

[1] No meaningful rate can be computed for this group because of the sampling error that would be involved.

[2] No meaningful figure can be computed for this group.

[3] This category numbered 574,000 in 1979 and 1,155,000 in 1985 and consists of three groups (i) people who had never had a job, (ii) former members of the armed forces, and (iii) those who had been unemployed for a long time (over 1 year in 1979, over 3 years in 1985) who were not asked about their previous occupation.

Mr. Dobson asked the Paymaster General what is the accuracy of figures for unemployment and vacancies in Greater London issued by the Department of Employment.

Mr. Lee: I am satisfied that the monthly unemployment count is an accurate record of those claiming benefits. Less frequent estimates of those without jobs seeking work are available from surveys. Results of the labour force survey conducted in spring 1985 showed some 327,000 people in Greater London without a job and looking for work compared with an average of 399,000 claiming benefits in the same period.

I am also satisfied that the monthly vacancy count is an accurate count of vacancies unfilled at jobcentres. Our latest information suggests that, nationally, about one third of all vacancies are notified to jobcentres. This proportion differs amongst regions.

Mr. Dobson asked the Paymaster General what was the total number of (a) unemployed and (b) vacancies in Greater London in 1978 on the present method of calculation; and what it has been in each year since.

Mr. Lee: The available information, which is also in the Library is as follows:

Unemployed claimants in Greater London excluding school leavers adjusted for discontinuities and seasonality—November each year

	Number
1978	122,000
1979	104,800
1980	174,600
1981	267,500
1982	305,400
1983	345,900
1984	371,900
1985	386,800
1986	393,300

Unfilled vacancies at job centres[1] in Greater London—November each year

[1] Excluding vacancies on Government programmes and vacancies notified to Professional and Executive Recruitment. Including self-employed vacancies.

Mr. Dobson asked the Paymaster General what was the total of people on Department of Employment schemes in Greater London in 1978 and each year since; and how many of these were aged (a) 16 to 17, (b) 17 to 18, (c) 18 to 19 and (d) 19 to 20 years.

Mr. Lee: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Community Programme

Mr. Thurnham asked the Paymaster General how many of those eligible for the community programme have benefit entitlement in excess of (a) £67 a week and (b) £53 a week.

Mr. Lee: Estimates based on survey information about the characteristics of those eligible for the community programme suggest that about 310,000 have benefit entitlements in excess of £67 a week, and about 490,000 have benefit entitlements in excess of £53 a week. The total number of persons eligible for the community programme is in excess of 1·4 million.

Availability for Work Test

Mr. Nicholls asked the Paymaster General if he is satisfied with the operation of the availability for work test; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Part-time Employees

Mr. Wainwright asked the Paymaster General what safeguards are enjoyed by part-time employees, who have signed variable contracts, which ensure (a) full credit for their national insurance contributions, (b) full national insurance contributions from their employer, (c) that they are covered by the normal redundancy rates and (d) that they can work additional hours and for another employer.

Mr. Lee: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services is responsible for arrangements concerning national insurance contributions. Entitlement to redundancy payments depends on the employee's length of continuous service and weekly hours of work with each separate employer. The length of continuous service required is two years where the contract of employment provides for at least 16 hours work a week and five years where it provides for at least eight hours a week. If an employee's contractual hours are reduced below 16 but not below eight hours weekly, for not more than 26 weeks, but then raised to 16 hours again, those weeks of reduced hours count for continuous service.

Subject to the agreement of the employer, employees are free to work for more than one employer. The number of hours worked for each would be a matter for negotiation. Part-time employees who work for more than one employer are entitled to a payment from whichever employer makes them redundant, subject to these qualifying conditions.

Training Initiative

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Paymaster General what is the content of the new training initiative for long-term unemployed; and how this will be divided up between assessment and job training.

Mr. Lee: The new job training scheme (JTS) pilot programmes provide participants with initial assessment, training in occupational skills supported by relevant practical experience and training in job-seeking skills. In addition all managing agents offer training in information technology and self employment skills for those who want and can benefit from these elements. Initial assessment takes place at the beginning of each programme and varies in length. Individual JTS programmes can vary between three and 12 months in length.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Paymaster General whether those long-term unemployed persons who accept a place on the new training initiative will be regarded as new claimants once the six months training period is completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Those trainees who are unemployed at the end of a training course under the new job training scheme and claim benefit will be regarded as new claimants in the same way as those persons who re-claim after other training courses.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Paymaster General whether he has any plans to extend the new training initiative beyond the nine pilot areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Yes. A tenth pilot area is starting in Leicester on January 12 1987.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Paymaster General whether he will make it his policy that those aged over 50 years will be invited to join the new training initiative for long-term unemployed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Priority for places on the new job training scheme pilots is being given to those who are under 25 and unemployed for more than six months, but older long-term unemployed people may also apply.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Paymaster General what are the numbers of employees in (a) full time and (b) part time employment in those companies which have accepted trainees under the new training initiative pilot scheme in Dundee (a) prior to the trainees joining the companies, and (b) one month after the trainees joined the companies.

Mr. Lee: This information is not available.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Paymaster General, pursuant to his reply, Official Report, 18 November, column 427, why his Department cannot advise those long-term unemployed persons who are invited to join the new training initiative in Dundee; and whether they will still qualify for single payments if they accept a place on the scheme.

Mr. Lee: I refer the hon. Member to my hon. Friend's reply to his earlier question, about advice given to potential trainees, on 25 November 1986 at column 59.

I also refer the hon. Member to the reply from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, to his question about single payments, on 20 November 1986 at column 334.

Nuclear Power

Dr. David Clark asked the Paymaster General what is the assessment level during normal operations for maximum annual radiation exposure of any person outside the site boundary applied by Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate in considering the safety case for a new nuclear power reactor expressed in millisieverts per year; and when this assessment level was introduced.

Mr. Lee: The maximum annual radiation exposure of any person outside the site boundary as a result of the normal operation of a new nuclear reactor licensed by Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate is 5msv, for the whole body.

This limit for the general public has been used since 1959 when the licensing of nuclear power reactors was introduced in the United Kingdom. The limit was first recommended by the International Commission for Radiological Protection in its document ICRP2 and again more recently in ICRP26.

Homeless People

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Paymaster General what consideration he has given to the report entitled "Homeless Young People in Britain: the Contribution of the Private Sector", a copy of which has been sent to him by Duncan Guthrie, the director of the disabilities study unit; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: I have considered the report and have asked the Manpower Services Commission to take account of the issues and implications which are raised in respect of homeless young people entering employment and training programmes.

Hazardous Substances

Mr. Flannery asked the Paymaster General how many installations have been notified to the Health and Safety Executive under the Notification of Installations Handling Hazardous Substances Regulations 1982.

Mr. Lee: One thousand, five hundred and thirteen.

Mr. Flannery asked the Paymaster General how many of the installations notified to the Health and Safety Executive under the Notification of Installations Handling Hazardous Substances Regulations 1982 are not sites which come under the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1984.

Mr. Lee: One thousand two hundred and eighty four.

Mr. Flannery asked the Paymaster General how many installations which have been notified to the Health and Safety Executive under the Notification of Installations Handling Hazardous Substances Regulations 1982 come under these regulations by virtue of the storage of the hazardous substance liquified petroleum gas.

Mr. Lee: Seven hundred and seven.

Handsworth (Ethnic Monitoring Exercise)

Mr. Rooker asked the Paymaster General if the information to unemployed claimants about the ethnic monitoring exercise at the Handsworth unemployment benefit office will be (a) in languages other than English and (b) given sufficiently in advance to claimants so as to allow them time to reflect before deciding whether to co-operate.

Mr. Lee: Posters have been on display in prominent positions in the offices since 18 December 1986 and are in the following languages:

English
Gujerati
Hindi
Urdu
Punjabi

Staff have been instructed not to count any claimant who does not seem to understand that he/she is being asked to give details of his/her ethnic origin.

Peckham (Task Force)

Ms. Harman asked the Paymaster General (1) how many new jobs have been created by the task force initiative in Peckham;

(2) how many of the new jobs created by the task force in Peckham have been filled by people resident in Peckham;

(3) how many more jobs he expects to be created as a direct result of the task force initiative in Peckham;

(4) how much of the money allocated to the task force initiative in Peckham has already been spent;

(5) what is the cost per job of each job created by the task force initiative in Peckham;

(6) what are the new jobs created by the task force initiative in Peckham.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Community Programme (Supervisors)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Paymaster General whether difficulties in the recruitment of supervisors to the Manpower Services Commission community programme have arisen among qualified applicants in receipt of benefits as a result of the average weekly wage limit of £67; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The wages of management and supervisory posts in community programme projects are not included in the calculation of the £67 average. The Manpower Services Commission maximum reimbursement rates for supervisors are based on local authority, non-manual workers rates. The latest increase was effected from 1 July 1986.

Apprentices (Greater London)

Mr. Dobson asked the Paymaster General what was the total number of apprentices in Greater London in 1978 and in each year since.

Mr. Lee: The available information relates to manufacturing industries since 1981, as follows:

Year (March)	Number of apprentices in manufacturing industries in Greater London (thousands)
1981	11·3
1982	9·5
1983	6·9
1984	5·1
1986	4·5

Note: Many of those receiving apprenticeship training under YTS (since 1983), specifically those without a contract of employment, are not counted as employees and are not included in the table. With the move away from traditional apprentice training in many industries some long duration schemes of a type which previously could have involved apprenticeships may not now be so classified.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what weight is given to the political opinions of officers seeking promotion within the Royal Ulster Constabulary; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: Internal promotion boards for the Royal Ulster Constabulary are a matter for the chief constable. Promotion within the Royal Ulster Constabulary is based solely on merit. The political opinions of officers seeking promotion are not taken into consideration.

Rates (Non-payment)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many summonses he has issued since 1 April for non-payment of rates.

Mr. Viggers: During the period 1 April 1986 to 31 December 1986 the Department of Environment (NI) issued 45,100 processes for the non-payment of rates.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many nights each of the Ministers in his Department spent in Northern Ireland during the months of July, August, September, October and November.

Mr. Tom King: The information is as follows:

	July 1986	August 1986	September 1986	October 1986	November 1986
Secretary of State	6	5	7	7	6
Mr. Nicholas Scott	10	10	8	4	7

Dr. Rhodes Boyson[1]	6	5	2	—	—

[1] Dr. Boyson left the Northern Ireland Office and Mr. Viggers joined in mid-September 1986.

Action for Community Employment

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a list of current sponsors of Action for Community Employment schemes in Northern Ireland by name, contact address, number of Action for Community Employment places and tasks.

Mr. Viggers: Information in the form requested could be compiled only at disproportionate cost. There are currently some 700 sponsors providing over 6,000 jobs throughout Northern Ireland.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what arrangements for monitoring the efficiency and effectiveness of the use of the Action for Community Employment scheme are currently being made; and what plans there are for improving the effectiveness of the use of the Action for Community Employment scheme.

Mr. Viggers: All applications from potential ACE sponsors are carefully scrutinised to ensure that they satisfy the aims and objectives of the scheme and regular on site inspections of projects are carried out. Regular reviews of ACE are made to ensure its continued effectiveness and to assess its usefulness in improving prospects of ACE workers to find permanent jobs.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether there are any plans for increasing the number of places available under the Action for Community Employment scheme.

Mr. Viggers: Yes. The number of jobs promoted through ACE will rise to an average of 6,200 throughout 1987-88.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the impact of the moratorium on approvals of Action for Community Employment schemes imposed by the Northern Ireland committee of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions in May.

Mr. Viggers: I take it the question relates to the Action for Community Employment scheme. The moratorium has had little impact—financial resources to undertake new projects had already been fully committed prior to the moratorium which does not affect existing projects.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has any plans for lifting the requirement for potential and current sponsors for Action for Community Employment schemes to seek trade union approval for their activities.

Mr. Viggers: No.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he is satisfied with the current arrangements for the recruitment, management and training of Action for Community Employment workers.

Mr. Viggers: Yes.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any plans for increasing the number of Action for Community Employment places available to undertake energy efficiency work, under the aegis of Neighbourhood Energy Action.

Mr. Viggers: I have no immediate plans to increase the number of Action for Community Employment (ACE) places involved in energy efficiency work.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the recent withdrawal of Action for Community Employment funds from St. Matthews Tenants Association in the Short Strand area of Belfast; and if he will lay down a policy for such terminations of Action for Community Employment funding in mid-term.

Mr. Viggers: The policy in respect of terminaion of Government funding for community groups is outlined in the reply given to a question by the hon. Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) on 27 June 1985.

Government financial assistance to the St. Matthew's Tenants Association is being withdrawn in accordance with this policy.

Short Brothers

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will place in the Library the text of the special study by the Tavistock Institute of Human Relations of recruitment to Short Brothers in Belfast, commissioned by the Northern Ireland Fair Employment Agency; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what conclusion was reached in the study by the Tavistock Institute of Human Relations on charges that Short Brothers practised unfair discrimination against Roman Catholics.

Mr. Viggers: A copy of the report by the Tavistock Institute of Human Relations on recruitment, selection and appointments at Short Brothers plc from April to December 1984 was placed in the Library on 18 December.

I welcome the findings of this report and note that it concluded that there was no statistical evidence of discrimination or failure to afford equality of opportunity.

THE ARTS

Public and Private Bodies (Expenditure)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts what monitoring is undertaken by his Department in respect of the total amount spent on the Arts by public and private bodies.

Mr. Luce [pursuant to his reply, 18 December 1986, c. 629]: My Department is responsible for its own expenditure and monitors expenditure under the arts programme by the non-departmental public bodies for which I am responsible. The monitoring of expenditure by other public bodies concerned with the arts is a matter for the responsible sponsor Departments, although I am of course interested in the information.

The amount of expenditure on the arts by private bodies is a matter for the organisation and individuals concerned. Some information on this is available from CIPFA and the Policy Studies Institute which undertake research and public statistics in this area.

Arts Council (Grant)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts what has been the total amount spent by his Department both directly and indirectly on funding literature in each of the past six years.

Mr. Luce [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 738]: Details of Arts Council and regional arts associations' funding for literature during each of the past six years are as follows:

	1981-82 £	1982-83 £	1983-84 £	1984-85 £	1985-86 £	1986-87 £

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts to what extent his Department is monitoring the effect on the arts of the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan councils.

Mr. Luce [pursuant to his reply, 18 December 1986, c. 630]: The Arts Council informs us of the position as and when requested.

Sponsorship

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts what information he has as to the amount of arts sponsorship undertaken by business in the United Kingdom for each year since 1982-83; and on what information his statistics are based.

Mr. Luce [pursuant to his reply, 18 December 1986, c. 630]: Precise figures are not available. Cautious estimates of arts sponsorship are provided by the Association for Business Sponsorship of the Arts. These figures are as follows:

1982-83	13
1983-84	n/a
1984-85	15
1985-86	20
1986-87	25

HOME DEPARTMENT

Crime Statistics

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek to obtain up-to-date statistics relating to crimes committed by persons remanded on bail; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Statistics of the type requested can only be obtained from a specially arranged research study, involving the collection of a considerable amount of extra data. We shall be considering, in the near future, whether the earlier study should be repeated, taking into account the additional data collection which would be required from police forces and the conflicting claims of other studies on limited resources.

Metropolitan Police (Pay)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average hourly rate of pay for a police constable in the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the average basic pay of a police constable in the Metropolitan police is £6·28 an hour. This includes London weighting and London allowance but not overtime payments or rent or other allowances.

News International Dispute

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of manhours of Metropolitan police officers deployed to date in connection with the News International dispute.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that up to 30 November 1986 the total number of manhours of officers deployed in connection with the News International dispute was 1,133,808.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the total number of arrests in connection with the News International dispute at Wapping to the latest available date; and if he will break down that number by alleged offence.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the commissioner that, up to 29 December, 1,370 people had been arrested in connection with the dispute. Of these 1,238 were charged. The principal offence charged in each was as follows:

	Number
Grievous bodily harm	4
Actual bodily harm	17
Assault on police	63
Criminal damage	65
Threatening/Insulting behaviour	507
Drunkenness	71
Highway obstruction	298
Obstructing police	177
Theft	26
Possession of offensive weapon	10
Total	1,238

Police (Cost)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the average total cost per police officer employed in each police force.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Actual expenditure per police officer in each police force in England and Wales for the financial year 1984-85 is given in column 47 of "Police Statistics 1984-85 Actuals" published in November 1985 by CIPFA (the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy, 1 Buckingham Gate, London, SW1E 6HS). I understand that "Police Statistics 1985-86 Actuals", giving this kind of information for the financial year 1985-86, are expected to be published at the end of January 1987.

Police (Clear-up Rate)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the number of crimes cleared up per police officer employed in each police force.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The ratios requested are given in the following table. The ratio of the number of offences cleared up to total notifiable offences recorded differs markedly for different categories of offence; hence the number of offences cleared up is affected by variations between police forces in the numbers of each type of offence recorded and the circumstances of those offences. It is also affected by variations in police practices in recording offences cleared up. Many officers may be involved in clearing up a single offence and the ratio does not indicate how many offences, on average, are dealt with successfully by each officer. Variations in the number of offences cleared up per officer may also reflect variations in other duties carried out by the police in respect of public order, crime prevention, traffic, and so on and variations in the numbers of civilian staff supporting the police, and in the duties which those staff perform.

Police Forces (Expenditure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the total expenditure of each police force and the total staff employed, showing separately the number of civilians in each case.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested, for police areas in England and Wales, is as follows. The expenditure figures in the second column are net of income but not of police grant, and are subject to audit.

Criminal Injury (Compensation)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated total amount of compensation paid in the latest year for which figures are available to victims of criminal injury who were awarded less than £550.

Mr. Mellor: About £2·4 million in the financial year ending 31 March 1986.

Criminal Injuries Compensation Board

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to increase the number of staff working for the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Ground) on 16 December 1986 at column 481.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to prevent delays in the processing of applications to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to questions from my hon. Friends the Members for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Ground) and for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) on 4 December 1986, at column 711.

European Community (Weapons)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has now received the draft of the Commission's directive designed to remove controls on weapons across community frontiers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No.

Immigration Rules

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish a consolidated version of the immigration rules incorporating those changes made since the last occasion when the full rules were published.

Mr. Waddington: A copy of the immigration rules incorporating changes made prior to last October is in the Libraries of both Houses. The changes made last October were confined to the appendix to the rules.

Myra Hindley

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Greater Manchester as to the cost of Myra Hindley's visit to Saddleworth moor, as to what information was gained from it, as to why information was given to the media prior to this taking place, as to the security provided, as to the number of police engaged and their forces, and as to what assessment he made of the threat to security presented by the presence on the moor of a man armed with a knife.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have received a preliminary report from the chief constable of Greater Manchester about the visit of Myra Hindley to Saddleworth moor on 16 December. At this stage, accurate costing for the operation is not available, but 135 officers from Greater Manchester police, Lancashire constabulary, West Yorkshire police, Kent constabulary, and the Metropolitan police were involved and a total of 1,590 hours of overtime were worked. The information provided by Miss Hindley during the visit indicated two sites where further investigation might prove valuable, one of which was not previously known to the police. The media were informed in advance only of Miss Hindley's offer to assist the police and not of authorisation for or timing of the visit. I understand that the presence on the moor of a man armed with a knife was not considered to be a serious threat and that he was at no time closer than two miles from Miss Hindley.

Police (Misconduct)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to how many police officers have given evidence (a) in private and (b) in public against the misconduct of fellow police officers in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have no statistics of this kind.

Stocken Prison

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what dates construction work at Her Majesty's prison Stocken on each of the four phases of prison officers' houses began; and what consideration was given by his Department to abandoning or curtailing the project, in view of the possible level of occupation.

Mr. Mellor: Construction work on the prison officers' houses at Stocken prison commenced on 17 September 1984. During the construction period a phased handover was agreed in order to provide early completion for some of the houses. The original planned level of provision of quarters at Stocken was to have been some 160 houses; in 1981 this was reduced to 40 houses, following agreement that staff were no longer required to occupy official quarters. This was seen as the prudent minimum at the time, and was again confirmed as the best estimate of requirements during a review in 1983, a year before the contract was let.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date or dates his Department became under legal contract to start each of the phases of construction work for prison officers' houses at Her Majesty's prison Stocken.

Mr. Mellor: The contract for the construction of the prison officers' houses at Stocken prison was the responsibility of the Property Services Agency, but I understand from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment that a single contract for the construction of all the houses was let on 8 August 1984.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the specific cost of (a) the six British Broadcasting Corporation micro-computers and (b) the two additional ones purchased for Her Majesty's prison Stocken; and why the 12 additional computers subsequently purchased were of a different type.

Mr. Mellor: The cost of the first six BBC B micro-computers was £399 each and that of the two BBC Master-series micro-computers purchased subsequently was £499 each. Both figures exclude the cost of peripheral equipment.

BBC micro-computers, which have widespread educational application, were obtained for use in a number of areas of the education programme as a learning aid and to allow students to develop basic computing skills. Ferranti micro-computers were provided for the separate vocational training course in computer studies to enable students to learn commercial computing skills using the type of equipment employed in a modern office environment. Emphasis is placed on the commercial application of skills and students are encouraged to aim for an appropriate qualification.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether he will identify the specific date or dates on which (a) the inmates' chairs, (b) the tutor's chair, (c) the tutor's desk, (d) the computer stands, (e) the filing cabinet or cabinets and (f) the carpet intended for the computer room at Her Majesty's prison Stocken were delivered to the prison; and whether the room is now operational;

(2) what was the purchase price of (a) the 13 inmates' chairs, (b) the tutor's chair, (c) the tutor's desk, (d) the computer stands, (e) the filing cabinet or cabinets and (f) the carpet intended for the computer room at Her Majesty's prison Stocken; and what instructions he has issued since regarding the need for competitive tendering and economic choice of supplies.

Mr. Mellor: The information about the price and delivery dates of the items ordered from the commercial supplier is as follows:

	Contract price (£) (excluding VAT)	Date delivered to establishment
13 students' chairs	1,040	31 July 1986
13 work stations	5,083	Delivered in part lots completed by end November 1986
1 carpet	745	17 June 1986
1 tutor's chair	133	[1]31 July 1986
1 tutor's desk	327	—
1 filing cabinet	245	—
1 cupboard	280	—

[1] Subsequently returned to the supplier.

The orders for the tutor's chair, desk, filing cabinet and cupboard were subsequently cancelled, at no cost to public funds, and these items replaced with cheaper alternatives from the Crown Suppliers. It has been made clear to the staff concerned that they must always seek best value for money in such purchases and, save in exceptional circumstances, follow departmental purchasing procedures including competitive tendering in all appropriate cases.

Commissioning work in the computer studies room is almost complete and the vocational training course is expected to begin within the next two weeks.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison officers who applied for posting to Her Majesty's prison Stocken prior to its initial opening indicated to his postings section that they would not transfer unless provided with a quarter, in accordance with paragraph 5 of notice to staff 57/84; how many indicated they would prefer a quarter but did not insist upon it; and how many indicated they expected to make their own arrangements for housing.

Mr. Mellor: Twenty-one staff who applied for transfer to Her Majesty's prison Stocken stated that they would require a quarter. A further 273 applied for transfer irrespective of the availability of quarters. Applicants were not required to state whether they would prefer to occupy a quarter or make their own arrangements for housing.

Reckless Driving

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the numbers of persons (a) imprisoned for being found guilty of reckless driving causing death or (b) disqualified from driving for life, for that offence, giving figures, for each year in the last 10 years.

Mr. Mellor: The information available on sentences for offences of causing death by reckless driving and on disqualifications imposed for offences of causing death or bodily harm is published annually in "Statistics of Offences Relating to Motor Vehicles, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables" (tables 7 and 14 of the issue for 1985).

NATO Civil Defence Committee

Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer of 3 December, Official Report, column 631, concerning the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation's civil defence committee, if he will state why it is inappropriate to place records of the committee's meetings in the Library.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The documents carry a NATO security classification.

Guardians Ad Litem

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to how many guardians ad litem have been appointed (a) in the Huddersfield magistrates' court area and (b) in the Kirklees metropolitan county area.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not held centrally.

Walter Yao

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will reconsider his decision to deport Walter Yao pending a full review of his case; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report the representations he has received concerning the proposed deportation of Walter Yao;

(3) if, in the light of further information now available, he will agree to meet the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside and Mr. Walter Yao to discuss the proposed deportation of the latter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I will write to the hon. Member once further representations about the case of Mr. Walter Yao have been considered. In the meantime, Mr. Yao will not be removed from the United Kingdom.

Offensive Weapons (Lambeth)

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration he has given to representations made to him by the community/police consultative group for Lambeth in relation to the law on offensive weapons and particularly knives and other sharp instruments.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Possession of an offensive weapon in a public place without lawful authority or reasonable excuse is an offence under the Prevention of Crime Act 1953. An offensive weapon is defined by the Act as any article made or adapted for causing injury, or intended for such use. It is difficult to see how this definition could be extended without making it illegal to carry innocently a whole range of items which have legitimate uses but which in the wrong hands may be dangerous. Nevertheless, we are continuing to keep the law on offensive weapons under close review and shall remain mindful of the representations which have been made on the subject by the community police consultation group for Lambeth.

Law and Order (Lambeth)

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his policy on law and order in the light of the report of the community police consultative group for Lambeth on the Brixton disorders of 1985, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I recently met members of Lambeth community police consultative group to discuss their report on the Brixton riot. Our aim remains to encourage the police to establish and maintain the good working relationship with the community which is an essential basis for preventing crime and disorder; to ensure that the police have the manpower and the equipment necessary to tackle disorder effectively if and when it occurs; and to ensure that the law gives the police sufficient powers to prevent and deal with disorder while preserving our traditional right of peaceful protest and assembly.

Crime Prevention (Lambeth)

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his policy on crime prevention in the light of the first report of the community police consultative group for Lambeth on the entry and search of premises and seizure of property and recommendations, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The report of the community police consultative group for Lambeth on the entry and search of premises and the seizure of property was concerned with the exercise of police powers. The group recognised that it carried out its review before the Police and Criminal Evidence Act code of practice for the searching of premises by police officers came into effect on 1 January 1986, and that this was likely to bring about significant changes. We believe this code has resolved many of the difficulties identified by the consultative group, but we have agreed that, when the code is reviewed in due course, full account will be taken of the group's recommendations.

Fire Cover (Greater London)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish Her Majesty's inspectorate of fire services' annual assessments of fire cover in Greater London for each year since 1972; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Assessment of standards of fire cover is a matter for the fire authority: in London, the Greater London council until 1 April 1986, and now the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority. It is not the practice to publish Her Majesty's inspectors of fire services' annual brigade inspection reports; but they give no ground for supposing that the fire authority has not made adequate arrangements to discharge its statutory obligations.

Police Service

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how far the employment provisions of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 have been implemented in respect of the recruitment, training, promotion, assignment of duties and other employment opportunities of women in the police service in England and Wales;

(2) how far an individual's sex is treated as a genuine occupational qualification for the purpose of employment in the police service.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Sex Discrimination Act applies to the police service with certain specified exceptions, including different minimum heights for male and female police officers. There are special provisions for maternity leave and women pay lower contributions because the police pension scheme makes no provision for the widowers of women police officers, other than in very exceptional circumstances. Otherwise, conditions of service for men and women are the same. An individual's sex is not treated as a genuine occupational qualification for the purpose of employment in the police service. Male and female police officers must compete on equal terms for promotion to higher ranks. It is the responsibility of chief officers to decide how best to allocate their officers to police duties. Ability, not sex, should be the criterion for the allocation.

Female Police Officers (Firearms)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether female police officers are given the same opportunities as male police officers for training in the use of firearms in the course of their employment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Yes, in England and Wales.

Deceased Persons (Police Custody)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have died each year since 1970 (a) in police custody and (b) in prison, and if he will give for each year a breakdown of the causes of death.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The number of persons who died in police custody (or otherwise with the police) during the years 1980 to 1985, together with the cause of death, number of inquests, and inquest verdicts are contained in the annual reports of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary—HC 409 (1980), and HC 463 (1981), HC 15 (1982), HC 528 (1983), HC 369 (1984), and HC 437 (1985)—and, for those within the Metropolitan police district, in the annual reports of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis (Cmnd. 8254, 8569, 8928, 9268, 9541, 9790). Information for 1986 is not yet available but will be included in the 1986 reports of the Chief Inspector and the Commissioner. Information for the years prior to 1980 was not collected centrally.

The details required in respect of deaths in prison custody in England and Wales are as follows:

Year	Total Number of deaths	Suicide	Coroner's verdict
			Natural	Non-natural
1970	42 (19)	6	31	5
1971	69 (28)	13	46	10
1972	53 (16)	13	36	4
1973	61 (34)	14	43	4
1974	48 (14)	6	34	8
1975	59 (19)	14	38	7
1976	67 (22)	20	39	8
1977	41 (13)	11	25	5
1978	60 (23)	16	34	10
1979	73 (21)	21	43	9
1980	65 (16)	21	33	11
1981	58 (20)	16	35	7

1983	64 (18)	21	33	10
1984	65 (17)	23	31	11
1985	39 (14)	23	23	13
1986[1]	56 (19)	4	12	6

[1] Coroners' verdicts have so far been received for only 22 cases in 1986.

N.B. The figures in parentheses indicate the number of the total who died in an NHS hospital.

Homeless People

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration he has given to the report entitled "Homeless Young People in Britain: The Contribution of the Private Sector", a copy of which has been sent to him by Duncan Guthrie, the director of the disabilities study unit; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We have seen a copy of this report and noted that most of its recommendations which are addressed to the Government are the concern of other Departments. Nevertheless, so far as we have opportunity, we shall continue to encourage voluntary organisations generally to work in partnership with the statutory sector, to be responsive to what may be the special needs of ethnic minorities, to develop effective equal opportunity policies and to improve the co-ordination of the services which they provide.

Indian Subcontinent (Visitors)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many visitors from India, Pakistan and Bangladesh were refused leave to enter and not given temporary admission in October 1985, November 1985, December 1985 and January 1986, respectively.

Mr. Waddington: The statistics available on persons refused leave to enter do not separately identify those granted temporary admission.

Visa Regulations

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received opposing the new visa regulations.

Mr. Waddington: I refer the hon. and learned Member to the answer I gave to a question by the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) on 20 November 1986, at column 687.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what have been the expenditure effects to date for his Department of the introduction of the new visa regulations.

Mr. Waddington: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Bryn Estyn (Open Prison)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what consultations he proposes to undertake in the Wrexham area before the construction of an open prison at Bryn Estyn, Wrexham;

(2) what is his policy towards the building of a new prison at Bryn Estyn, Wrexham; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will place a copy in the Library of any plans he has to build a new prison at Bryn Estyn, Wrexham.

Mr. Mellor: Informal consultations are taking place with Clwyd county council and Wrexham Maelor borough council under the provisions of Department of the Environment circular 18/84, which governs development proposals by Government Departments, about a possible prison development on the site of the former Bryn Estyn community home near Wrexham. A site feasibility study is also being undertaken by the Property Services Agency. If it is ultimately decided to proceed with the project, a formal notice of proposed development under circular 18/84 will be lodged with the planning authority, with whom responsibility for local consultation would then rest. Our present thinking is that the site should be developed to provide a closed category C prison for about 600 inmates; we have no plans to build an open prison.

Public Disorder

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from chief constables concerning the public disorder incidents in various towns and cities in which a number of police were injured on new year's eve; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: In consultation with chief officers of police, we are considering whether there are any lessons which can be learned from these incidents.

Car Telephones (Prosecutions)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been prosecuted for using hand-held car telephones whilst driving their vehicles on the highway; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The available information relates to proceedings at magistrates' courts for careles driving and other offences and is published annually in "Offences relating to Motor Vehicles, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables" (table 5 of the issue for 1985). Information is not collected centrally about the circumstances of these alleged offences.

Drunken Driving

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from each chief constable detailing the number of motorists stopped and positively breathalysed for drunken driving in each force area between Christmas and new year's day; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The official Home Office statistics on breath tests in England and Wales in 1986, including the Christmas period, will not be available until the middle of this year, but the Association of Chief Police Officers has collated provisional figures for the number of roadside screening tests which were positive in 42 police force areas, and this information is given in the table. Information is not yet available on the total number of tests carried out, but this will be included in the Home Office statistics.

Positive roadside screening tests carried out from 19 December 1986 to 1 January 1987

Drinking and Driving Campaign

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will recommend to the Association of Chief Police Officers that the campaign against drinking and driving should continue throughout the year, not just at Christmas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Drinking and driving is not just a problem at Christmas, and the Association of Chief Police Officers has made it clear that the police service enforces the law throughout the year.

Welsh Police (Bilingual Penalty Tickets)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which of the Welsh police forces have produced bilingual Welsh/English fixed penalty tickets for motoring offences under the new regulations for on-the-spot fines.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: None.

Dog Faeces

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the reasons for the delay in introducing byelaws relating to dog faeces.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I would refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave to questions by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) on 17 December 1986 at columns 554-58.

Police (Widows' Pension Increase)

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the reasons for his decision to veto the agreement for a weekly pension increase of £1.41p to elderly police widows; and what saving he expects to make.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: With regret, my right hon. Friend felt unable to implement the agreement reached by the Police Negotiating Board to increase the flat-rate pensions payable to police widows whose husbands retired before 1 April 1956. To do so would have been to breach the longstanding principle that pension entitlement under public service schemes should not be improved retrospectively. Such a breach could not be justified for this group of police widows in isolation from claims on behalf of other groups of public service widows.

The initial cost of awarding the increase recommended by the Police Negotiating Board is estimated at £455,000 per annum, but the cost of meeting the expected claims on other public service schemes would in total be unacceptably high.

Metropolitan Police (Guns)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions guns were issued to Metropolitan police officers in each district in 1978 and in each year since.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The figures are as follows:

Issue of firearms in each district of the Metropolitan Police in operations against persons known or believed to be armed, 1978 to 1985

	Occasions					Operations[1]

[1] The basis on which the figures are recorded was changed in 1983. From 1983 the figures record the number of operations in which firearms were issued; the figure for 1982 and earlier years record the number of occasions on which firearms were issued.
[2] Until 1985 airport district included West Drayton, Staines and Sunbury, but in that year parts of the district were allocated to T and X districts.
Figures for 1986 are not yet available.

Metropolitan Police (Crime Statistics)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many crimes in total, and how many crimes of violence, were committed in each district of the Metropolitan police in 1978 and in each year since;

(2) how many burglaries were committed in each district of the Metropolitan police in 1978 and in each year since;

(3) how many murders were committed in each district of the Metropolitan police in 1978 and in each year since;

(4) how many murders were cleared up by the Metropolitan police in 1978 and each year since; and what percentage this represents of total murders in its area.

Mr. Mellor: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were charged with (a) possession of heroin and (b) dealing in heroin in 1978, and in each year since, in the Metropolitan police area.

Mr. Mellor: The table gives the available information, which relates to the number of persons proceeded against for these offences.

Persons[1] proceeded against in the Metropolitan police district for (a) possession of and (b) trafficking in heroin Metropolitan police district

Number of persons

Offence	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985

Trafficking[2]	42	52	95	102	119	130	223	444

[1] As a person may have been proceeded against at the same time for both types of offence the figures cannot be added together to produce totals.

[2] Unlawful production, unlawful supply, possession with intent to supply unlawfully and unlawful import or export.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were cautioned formally for sexual offences (a) in each Metropolitan police district and (b) in the Metropolitan police area in 1978 and in each year since.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Metropolitan Police (Caution Procedures)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what procedures are followed in formal cautioning by the Metropolitan police;

(2) whether formal cautioning by the Metropolitan police involves an acknowledgement of guilt;

(3) how formal cautions by the Metropolitan police are recorded; and how long they remain on record in each form and place of record.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The criteria for the cautioning of offenders are set out in Home Office circular 14/1985, which provides that a person may be cautioned by the police only in cases where he admits the offence in question. the circular advises that this should normally be done in person by a police officer of the rank of inspector or above at a police station. Records of cautions should be kept locally and, in the case of offenders who have no other record, the the length of time for which these records are kept should be limited to three years or, in the case of a juvenile, until he has reached the age of 17, whichever is the later date. I understand from the Commissioner that the Metropolitan police follows this guidance.

Mr. Babu Lal Gupta

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Mr. Babu Lal Gupta, then a diplomat at the Indian High Commission, claimed diplomatic immunity in the course of police inquiries into drug trafficking; whether the Indian High Commission permitted him to be interviewed; when official inquiries into allegations of drug trafficking were completed; and when Mr. Gupta left the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brooke: As the inquiries were undertaken by HMCE and not the police, I have been asked to reply.

I have today answered a related question from my hon. Friend and I would refer him to that answer.

Immigration

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will publish the figures of those admitted to the United Kingdom for settlement over the past 12 months and state their country of origin.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 734]: The number of persons accepted for settlement in the United Kingdom in the 12 months ending 30 September 1986 (including both those granted settlement on their arrival and those granted settlement on removal of the time limit on their stay) was published by broad nationality grouping in table 1 of Home Office statistical bulletin "Control of Immigration: Statistics third quarter 1986" (issue 38/86).

Immigrants

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information his Department collects on the number of immigrants who have entered the United Kingdom with the stated intention of working, but who have not worked for a five-year period.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 735]: People who seek to enter the United Kingdom for the purpose of working here are admitted only if they qualify under the immigration rules. Detailed records are not kept of the subsequent circumstances of those who so qualify. However, those who are granted limited leave to enter for employment are required to show that they are still so employed before any extension of that leave is granted.

Tamils

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of Sri Lankan Tamils, (a) men and (b) women, who were held in detention on 10 December 1986.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 735]: On the night of 10/11 December 43 male and two female citizens of Sri Lanka were in detention under powers contained in the Immigration Act 1971 having arrived as passengers. No separate record is kept of the ethnic origin of detained Sri Lankans.

ENERGY

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the volume of (a) low level, (b) intermediate level and (c) high level nuclear waste that has arisen at Sellafield from the combined reprocessing of the total throughput of spent Magnox nuclear fuel derived from the Latina Magnox reactor in Italy and the Tokai Magnox reactor in Japan.

Mr. Goodlad: The quantities of low level and intermediate level radioactive waste attributable to the reprocessing of spent fuel from these reactors were given in my reply of 27 November to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, (Mr. Beith), at column 302 and of 15 December to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), at column 383, respectively. I am informed by British Nuclear Fuels that the total volume of high level waste is 90 cubic metres.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will set out the contractual obligations upon British Nuclear Fuels plc regarding the storage of nuclear waste arising from the management and reprocessing of imported spent Magnox fuel.

Mr. Goodlad: BNFL's contracts entered into prior to 1976 contain no express provisions regarding the storage of waste arising from the management and reprocessing of spent Magnox fuel. Since 1976 BNFL's contracts have contained options for the return of such waste. BNFL is obliged to provide interim storage of such waste prior to its return to the customer.

The Government's policy on the disposal of waste arising under BNFL's reprocessing contracts with overseas customers was set out in my reply to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on 2 May at column 502.

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy what resources have been used in his Department on the post-Chernobyl reviews of emergency procedures; what studies have been made or commissioned in revising the off-site emergency plans of nuclear installations; what discussions have taken place with the Central Electricity Generating Board on reviewing the reference accidents for off-site emergency plans; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer the hon. Member to the statement given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 18 December at columns 612 and 613, in reply to a question by hon. Friend the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash). The Department of Energy is participating fully in the review of emergency plans and is in touch with the CEGB and others as appropriate.

Sellafield

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will instruct British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. to allow access to Sellafield nuclear plant of Euratom inspectors in assessing the appropriate safeguarding of designated civil nuclear material on the same terms as applied to the nuclear installations inspectorate in conducting their recent safety audit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Euratom safeguards inspectors already have the necessary right of access to all the civil nuclear material at Sellafield.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy of 18 December 1986, Official Report, column 620, on public visits to Sellafield, if he will now withdraw his invitation to the public to visit Sellafield made during his visit on 7 May 1986 in consideration that such arrangements are matters for which British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. is responsible.

Mr. Goodlad: No.

Electricity Supply

Mr. Neale asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has completed his consideration of the requisition for mains electricity supply to Bolventor and Temple on Bodmin moor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: My Department is making every effort to resolve the complex issues involved in the South Western Electricity board's appeals against the requisitions from Bolventor and Temple. My right hon. Friend will announce his decisions on the appeals as soon as he possibly can.

British Coal Enterprise Ltd.

Sir Ian Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many new jobs have been created by the British Coal Enterprise scheme at the latest convenient date; and if he will give details for each area of Great Britain.

Mr. David Hunt: At the end of December 1986 British Coal Enterprise Ltd. had assisted in the creation of 13,077 new job opportunities. The regional breakdown is as follows:

	Number
Scotland	2,518
North East	1,875
Yorkshire	2,289
North Midlands	358
South Midlands	656
Western	1,652
South Wales	3,561
South East	168

The company has so far committed £20·8 million and has generated a total of £137 million of job creation investment.

Details of the company's activities are contained in the annual review and in the report and accounts, copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House.

Coal Industry

Sir Ian Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will bring up to date the figures for colliery output and productivity of British Coal by area which were given by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to the hon. Member for Havant on 18 October, Official Report, columns 75-76.

Mr. David Hunt: I am advised by British Coal that the total deep mine revenue output and average revenue output per man shift for each area for the fiscal month of November 1986 were as follows:

Four weeks ended 22 November 1986

Area	Revenue output (thousand tonnes)	Output per man shift (tonnes)
Scotland	252	2·51
North East	867	3·06
North Yorkshire	1,434	4·64
South Yorkshire	1,011	3·46
North Derbyshire	587	4·09
Nottinghamshire	1,576	3·52
South Midlands	520	3·64
Kent	47	2·55
Western	906	3·65
South Wales	602	2·76

Theatre Groups

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will place in the Library the material used by theatre groups financed by his Department and concerning energy, after vetting by his Department.

Mr. Peter Walker: I will place a representative sample of theatre group scripts in the Library of the House, together with project material which they distribute. If the hon. Member wishes to see a school performance, I will ask my Energy Efficiency Office to make the arrangements.

Berkeley and Oldbury Power Stations

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Energy if there are any plans to develop and test emergency evacuation plans for Cheltenham in the event of a serious accident at Berkeley or Oldbury power stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 12 December 1986, at columns 195-6.

Dounreay Power Station

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy what incidents at United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, Dounreay, were notified to Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate (a) between February 1977 and July 1982 and (b) since August 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Details of incidents at Dounreay notified to Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate under the arrangements reported to Parliament on 2 February 1977 and revised by the statement to Parliament on 26 July 1982 are given in the Health and Safety Executive's quarterly statements on nuclear incidents, copies of which are in the House of Commons Library. The relevant references in those statements are as follows:

The first two incidents in 1977 happened in the first quarter. The numbers 5 and 6 refer to incident number, not date.

Magnox Fuel

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish weekly input-output tables of spent Magnox nuclear fuel reprocessed at Sellafield over the last two years.

Mr. Goodlad: No.

Civil Nuclear Power

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will list the categories of information held by his Department on civil nuclear power which are deemed necessary to be kept secret on grounds of national interest;

(2) pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) Official Report, 19 November 1986, column 233, if he will set out the nature of the sensitivity of information to which he refers; and what are the aspects of the national interest that any revelations of information on the civil nuclear programme are likely to damage.

Mr. Goodlad: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Uranium

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether there has been any change in policy since 1985 with regard to the disclosure of information on the import of uranium by the Central Electricity Generating Board.

Mr. Goodlad: No. It is my policy to be as open as possible, subject to considerations of commercial confidentiality.

SCOTLAND

"Paying for Local Government"

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a summary of responses to the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" equivalent to the Department of the Environment publication "Paying for Local Government, a Summary of Responses to the Green Paper."

Mr. Rifkind: In accordance with normal Scottish Office practice, copies of formal responses to the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd 9714) submitted to the Scottish Office have been made available for public inspection in the Library of St. Andrew's House, Edinburgh.

The pattern of responses on the proposed replacement of domestic rates by the community charge, and on non-domestic rating reform issues, was broadly similar to that shown in the summary published by the Department of the Environment.

European College of Education

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what further consideration he has given to the establishment of a European college of education at the site of the Dundee college of education.

Mr. John MacKay: I am aware of no developments since my reply to the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) on 7 November 1986 at column 71.

Teaching Staff (Interviews)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether a teacher or lecturer may make and keep a recording of an interview by, or meeting with, an inspector for the sake of staff development and safeguarding personal professional reputation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: It requires the agreement of all the parties taking part in an interview or meeting for a recording to be taken. In the case of an interview between a teacher or lecturer and one of Her Majesty's inspectors it would depend on the circumstances whether or not the inspector would agree to a recording being taken.

Physical Education

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the intake of first-year students at the Scottish school of physical education at Jordanhill college and at Dunfermline college of physical education, respectively, in each of the last three years.

Mr. Rifkind: The numbers of United Kingdom-based first-year students in physical education entering the colleges in each of the years 1984-85, 1985-86 and 1986-87 were Dunfermline 40, 40, 40 and Jordanhill 20, 22, 20 respectively.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when a final decision will be taken on the proposed closure of the Scottish school of physical education at Jordanhill college.

Mr. Rifkind: In the light of my decision to centralise physical education teacher training, there will be no further intake of physical education students to Jordanhill college of education. The working party set up to consider the implementation of the rationalisation of training in this field has recommended that no pre-service physical education students should be trained at Jordanhill after June 1989.

I await the views of the governing bodies concerned on the report as a whole.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what additional facilities, including covered sports halls and playing fields, will be required if the centralisation of physical education training at Dunfermline college goes ahead as planned; and what will be the costs of such developments.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer to my hon. Friend's reply of 7 November to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill at column 633. The working party set up to consider the implementation of the centralisation of the training of physical education teachers and the merger of Dunfermline college of physical education with Moray House College of Education identified a number of priorities for enhancing existing facilities at the merged college. Although precise costings were not available, it recommended inter alia the sale of playing fields owned by Moray house and a financial appraisal of the consequent provision of a floodlit synthetic pitch at the Dunfermline campus. The working party noted that increasingly national and regional sporting centres expect to have such a facility, which Jordanhill also lacks. It is not possible at this stage to give an estimate of the net expenditure, if any, which this project would entail. The working party also supported a longstanding proposal to upgrade and extend the games hall facilities at Dunfermline.

I await the views of the governing bodies concerned on the report as a whole.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate his Department has made of the likely entry to the first year in colleges of education of students studying physical education in each of the next three years; and what proportion of these will be (a) male and (b) female.

Mr. Rifkind: My Department's statistical model has predicted that the required intake to teacher training courses in physical education in each of the years 1987, 1988 and 1989 will be 88, 94 and 103 respectively. The Department has recently consulted education authorities and others about the extent to which the 1987 estimate needs to be adjusted in the light of wider supply issues, including authorities' own estimates of their likely needs. I expect to decide soon on the 1987 intake in the light of these consultations.

To maintain the existing sex distribution of PE teachers in schools, about one-third would be male, but the actual proportion of male and female students in the intake will depend on decisions made by the college in the light of the applications for places.

Gas Flaring (Air Pollution)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what reports he has received from Her Majesty's industrial air pollution inspectorate on the land-based flaring systems operated by BP Petroleum Development

Ltd., Sullom Voe, Shetland and Occidental Petroleum (Caledonia) Ltd., Flotta, Orkney; and if he will place such reports in the Library.

Mr. Ancram: Annual reports on industrial air pollution, published by the Health and Safety Executive, are already available in the Library. They include comments on the operation of the flaring systems at Sullom Voe and Flotta.

Livestock Units (Erection)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received concerning his proposal to control the erection of livestock units near residential properties; and what reply he has sent.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. and learned Friend has received no representations following his announcement on 13 November 1986 of his proposals to extend planning controls to certain new livestock buildings.

Homelessness

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration he has given to the report entitled "Homeless Young People in Britain: The Contribution of the Private Sector", a copy of which has been sent to him by Duncan Guthrie, the director of the disabilities study unit; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. and learned Friend has only very recently received a copy of this report, which contains a wide range of recommendations. These are at present being considered. I will ensure that the right hon. Member receives a copy of the reply which will in due course be sent to Mr. Guthrie.

SCOTLAND

A9 (Improvements)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has received any objections to the draft compulsory purchase order for the Dunbeath bridge scheme on the A9; and if he will give his latest estimate of the date for work on the project to begin.

Mr. Ancram: No objections to the draft compulsory purchase order have been received. Construction is expected to start in the summer.

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current proposed starting date for the improvement of the A9 at Navidale Brae, north of Helmsdale in Sutherland.

Mr. Ancram: Investigations to determine a suitable route giving an adequate economic return are still in progress. A starting date is subject to identification of such a route, and thereafter to the satisfactory completion of statutory procedures and the availability of funds.

A7 (Redevelopment)

Mr. Archie Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether any further statutory procedures remain outstanding before the Scottish Development Department will be in a position to advertise for contractors to undertake the work involved in the redevelopment of the A7 trunk route through the Sandbed area of Hawick; what is the earliest date that the Scottish Development Department could put the Sandbed contract out to tender; how soon after a contractor had been engaged the site works can commence; how long the site demolition work will take to complete; what arrangements are to be made with interested parties for the detailed provision of appropriate landscaping and street furniture in the Sandbed area; and what schemes are available to proprietors of properties in the Sandbed area to encourage them to upgrade their properties in conjunction with the Scottish Development Department scheme.

Mr. Ancram: The statutory procedures for the A7 Sandbed junction improvement scheme have been completed. Because of the small scale of the project, there will be no advertisment for interested contractors. Instead a short list of contractors will be invited by Borders regional council, as agents for the Secretary of State, to tender in March. It is planned to commence work in May, with the work spread over four months. Demolition work is expected to take approximately one week. A landscaping scheme is being prepared, and the views of interested parties will be sought and considered. Grants are available for the repair and maintenance of buildings which are of outstanding architectural or historical interest, and towards the costs incurred in the preservation or enhancement of the character or appearance of outstanding conservation areas.

Cancer Statistics

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many women died of (a) cervical cancer and (b) breast cancer in each health board area in 1978 and in each year since, giving separately the number of women who died who were over 50 years of age.

Mr. John MacKay: The exact information requested in not readily available. The following table shows the numbers of deaths for women of all ages and for those aged 45 and over.

Deaths of Women from (a) Cervical Cancer (ICD[1] 180) and (b) Breast Cancer (ICD[1] 174) by Health Board Area, 1978 to 1981

NATIONAL FINANCE

Mr. Babu Lal Gupta

Mr. Wheeler asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what access was sought by officers of the Customs and Excise to an Indian diplomat, Babu Lal Gupta; and what was the outcome of their inquiries into allegations of drug trafficking.

Mr. Brooke: Mr. Babu Lal Gupta did not claim diplomatic immunity and was interviewed by officers of Customs and Excise with the full co-operation of the Indian High Commission on 8 June 1984. The interview, in connection with the seizure of 4·5 kgs of heroin from Mr. Hans Raj Sharma at London Heathrow airport on 30 May 1984 did not further the officers' inquiry. Later in June, on completion of his tour of duty in the United Kingdom, Mr. Gupta returned to India.

Inland Revenue (Computerisation)

Mr. Colvin asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the computerisation of the Inland Revenue will be completed.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Inland Revenue is carrying out a number of major computerisation projects. The computerisation of the entire PAYE and schedule D systems will have been completed as planned by the end of 1988. This will be followed by a further project in local tax offices which will computerise the making of tax assessments on the earnings of companies. The Department has also embarked on a computerisation project in local collection offices to provide an on-line computer system. These projects should all have been completed by the early 1990s.

Customs and Excise (Overtime Budget)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what information is available through (a) management information systems and (b) other reporting arrangements of the nature and extent of the operational consequences for Customs and Excise preventive work of budget ceilings for overtime working; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what range of duties of Customs and Excise officers engaged in preventive work require regular or rostered use of overtime; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will name and describe the administrative units to which overtime budgets are allocated for Customs and Excise preventive work; and if he will make a statement.

(4) if he will name and describe the budgets controlled at local and regional levels to provide overtime working on Customs and Excise preventive work; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The financial provision for the payment of overtime in the preventive service of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise is made in the Department's overtime budget which is administered by collectors controlling budget centres from regional offices (collections).

Management information and other reporting arrangements exist which enable the Department to determine the allocations of overtime budgets against perceived operational requirements. Most of the duties laid to preventive officers require some measure of regular or rostered overtime.

Civil and Public Services Association

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has about the result of the recent re-run of the Civil and Public Services Association election for general secretary; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: As the hon. Member for Leicester, East has noted in early day motion No. 382, Mr. John Ellis has been elected to the post of general secretary of the Civil and Public Services Association.

EC (Economic and Financial Policy)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the achievements of the United Kingdom's presidency of the European Community Council of Ministers in respect of economic and financial matters.

Mr. Lawson: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Latham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the financial loss to Government revenues if the exemption threshold for value added tax were raised to £50,000 (a) for the remainder of the current financial year and (b) for the financial year 1987-88.

Mr. Brooke: The revenue loss would depend crucially on the number of businesses that decided to deregister if the exemption threshold were raised. But the loss in 1987-88 from an increase in the threshold to £50,000 could be expected to be between £100 million and £200 million. The effect on revenue in 1986-87 of an immediate change cannot be estimated because of uncertainties about the likely timing of businesses' decisions to deregister, but it would probably be slight.

Works of Art

Mr. Faulds asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether he will make representations to the European Economic Community Commissioners regarding the seventh directive on the harmonisation of value added tax on works of art; and whether he will make a statement;

(2) what assessment he has made of the implications for museums and galleries and private art collectors and benefactors of the seventh directive on the harmonisation of value added tax on works of art; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The draft seventh VAT directive, which was first proposed by the EC Commission in 1978, is still under discussion at official level: it would not be appropriate for Ministers to intervene at this stage. But I am aware of the effect which the proposed draft directive would have on museums and galleries and private art collectors and benefactors. Their views will continue to inform the British position in the Brussels negotiations. Draft VAT directives require unanimous agreement in the Council of Ministers before they can be adopted.

Free Trade Zones

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the progress to date of each of the free trade zones.

Mr. Brooke: The present position is as follows:

Belfast:
Customs approval to start operations expected soon; operator reports numerous inquiries but no firm commitments from potential users.

Birmingham: (West Midlands)
Opened on 27 November 1986; one user at present, another has been authorised to trade, four other applications are under consideration.

Cardiff:
Yet to start operations.

Liverpool:
Opened on 20 December 1984; 37 traders at present authorised to use free zone; in 1986 calendar year 190,000 tons of goods (value £60 million) passed through free zone.

Prestwick:
Ceased operations on 31 October 1986 though Kyle and Carrick District Council at present considering ways in which the company may be revived.

Southampton:
Opened on 30 September 1985; at present two users; annual throughput about £15 million.

Goods and Services (Tax Yield)

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated tax yield of section 79 of the Finance Act 1972 in the current year.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I regret that no information on the tax yield from section 79 of the Finance Act 1972 is available centrally.

Overseas Investment

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the level of overseas investment in both current and constant price terms each year since 1960, with direct and portfolio investment differentiated for each year.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the annual percentage change in total output since 1970, using the output measure of gross domestic product at constant factor cost; and what has been the annual percentage change in the total excluding the extraction of oil and gas.

Mr. MacGregor: Between 1970 and the third quarter of 1986, the most recent period for which data are available, the output measure of gross domestic product increased at an average rate of 1·8 per cent. per year. The corresponding figure for all industries other than oil and gas extraction is 1·4 per cent.

Income Tax

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the gain or loss to those with incomes (a) under £5,000, (b) £5,000 to £10,000, (c) £10,000 to £15,000, (d) £15,000 to £20,000, (e) £20,000 to £30,000, (f) £30,000 to £50,000, (g) £50,000 to £70,000 and over £70,000 a year as a result of each Finance Act since 1979, both in aggregate and per person on average in each of these categories, in each case indicating how much is due to indexation and how much is real gain.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the research report commissioned by the Treasury, recently completed, into the incentive effects of income tax cuts.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 18 December to the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) at column 668.

Personal Incomes

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the annual percentage increase in real personal disposable income each year since 1957.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him on 4 December 1986 at column 776.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, for the financial year 1986-87, he will indicate the number of taxpayers expected to receive relief on mortgage interest and the anticipated average relief per mortgagor, for those with annual incomes of (a) £30,000 to £40,000, (b) £40,000 to £50,000, (c) £50,000 to £60,000, (d) £60,000 to £70,000 and (e) over £70,000.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Estimates based on projections from the 1984-85 survey of personal incomes are as follows:

Tax units[1] receiving mortgage interest relief by range of total income—1986-87

Range of total income £'000	Numbers receiving mortgage relief '000	Average value of relief per mortgagor £	Total cost of relief £ million

United Nations International Years

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list Her Majesty's Government's contributions to United Kingdom organisations set up in each of the past eight years in respect of designated United Nations international years.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Cigarettes

Mr. Coombs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was his forecast of the consumption of cigarettes following the 1986 Budget; what is his current forecast; and to what extent the difference in these forecasts is attributable to the importation of foreign cigarettes.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 747]: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not publish estimates of the consumption of cigarettes, though of course in forming his Budget judgment he takes into account the likely effects of tax changes on the market. In the nine months to September, clearances of cigarettes were down by about 7·5 per cent. on the corresponding period of 1985. At present, about 11·5 per cent. of clearances are accounted for by imported cigarettes. This represents an increase in volume of about 3·5 per cent. on the previous year.

Mortgages

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish any information he has on the distribution of outstanding mortgages which attract tax relief giving details of amount and length of mortgages and setting out any assumption used.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Information on the distribution of outstanding mortgages which attract tax relief is not available from administrative tax data. Estimates of the distribution of mortgage interest payments which attract tax relief, based on projections to 1986-87 of information in the 1984-85 "Survey of Personal Incomes" and 1985 "Family Expenditure Survey," are given in the following table. These estimates include mortgages formerly under the option mortgage scheme, now subsumed under MIRAS.

The general level of mortgage interest rates in 1986-87 is assumed to be 11·5 per cent. as some lenders charge a different interest rate, the distribution of outstanding mortgages cannot be derived accurately from the distribution of interest payments. Information on the length of mortgages is not available.

DEFENCE

Regiments (Other Entrants)

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those regiments for which it is advisable that aspiring officer entrants have private incomes.

Mr. Freeman: The Army has no such requirements.

Binary Chemical Weapons

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what studies have been made of the likely effects on European security of the French Government's intention to develop a binary chemical weapon; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: No studies have been made by Her Majesty's Government. The Government have noted the announcement by the French Government that France should possess an appropriate deterrent capacity of chemical weapons.

Armed Forces (Equipment Procurement)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what arrangements exist to determine the operational requirements of major equipment to be procured for Her Majesty's forces; what person or committee is authorised to determine operational requirements at each stage (a) in concept formulation and in definition of staff target, (b) in feasibility study and in definition of staff requirement, (c) in project definition, if appropriate, and (d) in full development; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what arrangements existed to determine the operational requirements of major equipment to be procured for Her Majesty's forces at the times relevant to determining actions of the operational requirements for demountable rack off-loading pick-up systems; whether these arrangements have since been changed; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will list the dates on which a staff target for demountable rack off-loading pick-up system equipment was either stated or updated; what person or committee was authorised to determine the operational requirements contained in each such staff target; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he will list the dates on which a staff requirement for demountable rack off-loading pick-up systems equipment was either stated or updated; what person or committee was authorised to determine the operational requirements contained in each such staff requirement; and if he will make a statement;

(5) if he has received any guarantees regarding application of the United States of America Export Administration Act to offset orders in connection with the Boeing air warning aircraft system contract; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I shall answer shortly.

Foreign Naval Vessels (United Kingdom Visits)

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Soviet naval vessels have visited United Kingdom ports in each year since 1970; and if he will list (a) the port visited, (b) the name of the ship and (c) the type and class of ships.

Mr. Stanley: The following Soviet naval vessels have visited United Kingdom ports since 1970:

	1970	1976
Port	Leith	Portsmouth
Vessel	Arktica	Obraztovy
Type	Naval survey vessel	Destroyer
Class	Moma	Kashin

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many United States naval vessels have visited United Kingdom ports in each year since 1970; and if he will list (a) the ports visited, (b) the name of the ships, and (c) the type and class of ship.

Mr. Stanley: My Department estimates that, since 1970, around 800 United States naval vessels have visited various United Kingdom ports. Full records of such visits are not generally retained, and the complete information sought by the hon. Member could be provided only at disproportionate cost. I refer him, however, to the replies which I gave to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) on 16 May 1985, at columns 209-10 and on 13 March 1984, at column 132.

Ferranti Computer Assisted Command System

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of trials and operation of the Ferranti computer assisted command system on board Her Majesty's ships; what is the cost of development to date and the estimated additional cost prior to the system entering service; how these costs compare with the original estimate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A computer assisted command system, known as CACS1, is currently installed in Type 22 frigates and is undergoing extensive trials which are proving valuable in revealing the system's potential operational capability: CACS has not yet been formally accepted for full operational use. It is not the practice to publicise project costs which are commercially confidential between the Ministry of Defence and individual contractors.

Noise Compensation Policy

Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has now completed the review of noise compensation policy; and if he will make a statement about the implications of the review generally and in the vicinity of RAF Leuchars particularly.

Mr. Freeman: The review of the Ministry's policy for providing sound insulation grants and compensation for noise in the vicinity of military airfields is complete. Certain changes have been approved bringing my Department's policy broadly in line with that applying to major civil airports. These changes were announced in an answer given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement to the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) on 14 November 1985 at columns 260-1.

The most significant change as far as RAF Leuchars is concerned is the reduction of the qualifying level for sound insulation grants. I shall be announcing an extension to the existing noise compensation scheme at Leuchars shortly.

Armoured Divisions

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the annual cost of retaining an armoured division in the Federal Republic of Germany;

(2) what is the total annual cost of operating and maintaining a regiment of tanks.

Mr. Stanley: The annual running cost of an armoured division will depend on a number of factors including its composition, location and activity levels. On the basis of a division comprising five armoured regiments, five mechanised infantry battalions and appropriate signals, artillery and aviation support the average cost would be in excess of £200 million a year at current prices. This excludes, inter alia, the capital costs of equipment, indirect support, headquarters costs and accommodation. On the same basis the annual cost of a tank regiment is about £12 million.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average number of officers and men in an armoured division.

Mr. Freeman: The precise number of officers and men will depend on its composition and role, but the average peacetime establishment of an armoured division is approximately 13,000.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average number of tanks in an armoured division.

Mr. Freeman: It is not our practice to give details of the number of tanks in operational units or formations.

Challenger Tank (Cost)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the average cost of a Challenger tank;

(2) what is the average production cost of a Challenger tank.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The current budgetary cost of a Challenger tank (fully equipped) is £1·5 million.

Nimrod Airframes

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future use of the eleven Nimrod airframes originally intended for the airborne early warning system.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A number of possible uses for the eleven Nimrod airframes are under consideration.

Helicopters (Germany)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many squadrons of helicopters are currently based with the Royal Air Force in Germany; and if he will list the number of each type.

Mr. Stanley: Two squadrons of RAF helicopters are currently based in Germany, comprising one squadron of Chinooks and one squadron of Puma. It is not our practice to reveal details of numbers of operational aircraft.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many squadrons of helicopters are currently based in Germany with the British Army of the Rhine listing the number of each type.

Mr. Stanley: There are 10 Army air corps helicopter squadrons currently based in Germany operating Gazelle and Lynx helicopters. It is not our practice to reveal details of numbers of operational aircraft.

Combat Aircraft (Germany)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many squadrons of Royal Air Force fixed wing combat aircraft are currently based in Germany; and if he will list the number of each type.

Mr. Stanley: Twelve squadrons of RAF fixed wing combat aircraft are currently based in Germany, comprising seven squadrons of Tornado GR1, two squadrons of Harriers, two squadrons of Phantoms and one squadron of Jaguars. It is not our practice to reveal details of numbers of operational aircraft.

Army Horses (Stag Hunts)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost to public funds of Army horses being used in stag hunts in the New Forest on 17 November and 8 December, respectively.

Mr. Freeman: Horses from the Household Cavalry regiment participated in hunting in the New Forest on 17 November and 8 December 1986 at the invitation of the New Forest Buckhounds. No additional costs to public funds arose from their participation, apart from minor transportation costs from nearby RAF Sopley, where the regiment had arranged military and equestrian training.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Army horses were used in stag hunts in the New Forest on 17 November and 8 December, respectively.

Mr. Freeman: Seven Army horses on 17 November and six on 8 December 1986.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions during the last five years Army horses have been used in stag hunts; and how many have been injured.

Mr. Freeman: Army horses do not usually hunt with stag hounds, although they did so on two occasions at the end of last year. This was for the first time in recent years. No horses were injured.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what funds accrue to his Department for the hiring of horses to be used in stag hunts in the New Forest.

Mr. Freeman: None, as Army horses are not hired out for this purpose.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence to what regiments Army horses are attached which were used for stag hunts in the New Forest on 17 November and 8 December.

Mr. Freeman: The horses belonged to the Household Cavalry regiment based in London.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many officers and men, of which regiments, and of what rank and trade were involved in the transport of hunting horses to the New Forest on 17 November and 8 December.

Mr. Freeman: Three drivers, lance corporals from the Blues and Royals, were responsible for the transportation of horses to the New Forest from RAF Sopley (two on 17 November 1986 and one on 8 December 1986). In addition, the following also participated in the hunting on 17 November.

Number	Rank	Regiment	Appointment
1	Lieutenant	The Blues and Royals	Troop Leader
1	Corporal of Horse	The Blues and Royals	Troop Corporal of Horse
1	Corporal of Horse	The Life Guards	Troop Corporal of Horse
1	Lance Corporal of Horse	The Blues and Royals	Troop NCO
1	Trooper	The Blues and Royals	Mounted Dutyman
2	Trooper	The Life Guards	Mounted Dutyman

Trident

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the evidence upon which he based his assessment of the number of tank regiments that could be maintained if Trident expenditure was switched to conventional defence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: Our assessment is that over 20 years the cost of maintaining one armoured division (including the capital costs over that period of necessary re-equipment) would be some £8·9 billion compared to the costs of buying Trident over its 20 year procurement period of £9·9 billion both at average 1985-86 prices. The costs quoted are based on the largest existing armoured division which is assumed to be equipped to current average standards initially. They exclude therefore any additional captial costs of equipping a division from new and of providing land and buildings to accommodate the servicemen concerned and their families.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the latest estimated lifetime running costs of the Trident submarines.

Mr. Stanley: The running costs of Trident should not be significantly different from those for our existing Polaris force. We estimate that at their peak, Trident running costs will amount to some £220 million per annum (at 1985/86 prices) which represents approximately 1·2 per cent. of the current value of the Defence Budget.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much has been spent on the Trident project to the nearest convenient date.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: To the end of December 1986, some £820 million had been spent on the Trident project. £2,750 million has been contractually committed.

Tanks

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many troops are required to operate and maintain a regiment of tanks.

Mr. Stanley: The precise numbers vary according to its composition and role, but about 600 officers and men are required for the operation and first line maintenance of an armoured regiment. However, the second and third line administrative, transport and workshop support required are not allocated on a regimental basis.

Mr. Trafford Boughton

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if any attempt was made by his Department to solicit from Mr. Trafford Boughton a letter disociating himself and his company from the British Broadcasting Corporation "Panorama" programme of 7 July 1986 on the awarding of the DROPS contract;

(2) if it was with ministerial authority that Major General Stevan Stopford telephoned Mr. Trafford Boughton on 30 June 1986 requesting him to send a letter immediately to the Department disociating himself and his company from the British Broadcasting Corporation "Panorama" programme of 7 July 1986 on the awarding of the DROPS contract;

(3) if it was with ministerial authority that officials of his Department (a) spoke on the telephone to Mr. Trafford Boughton in April and May 1986 and (b) to him in person at the British Army equipment exhibition concerning a proposed television programme on the awarding of the DROPS contract;

(4) if his Department keeps any record of (a) telephone conversations and (b) informal discussions between officials and defence contractors or potential defence contractors.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I shall answer shortly.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Departmental Initiatives

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list initiatives by his Department which have been of benefit specifically to the north-east, north-west and Yorkshire and Humberside regions since 1979.

Mr. Fowler: All these localities have benefited from the increases in expenditure on health, personal social services and social security since 1979.

The Government have protected and increased the real value of nearly all the major social security benefits and the Social Security Act 1986 will introduce major reforms designed to target help more effectively, simplifying the system and tackling the worst effects of the poverty and unemployment traps.

Many initiatives are being undertaken by local social security offices to increase public awareness of the many benefits on offer. These include a project based at Bradford to provide an interpreting and translating service for members of the Asian community and an advice surgery run by Manchester central ILO. Regional freephone services have been introduced and a special eight page benefit supplement was compiled for publication by the Liverpool Echo.

The relevant regional health authorities (Northern, Yorkshire, Mersey and North Western) have benefited from the Government's policy of giving higher increases in funding to those National Health Service regions which have historically received less than their fair share of resources. Gross revenue spending has risen from £1,212 million in 1978-79 to £2,688 million in 1985-86—a real terms increase of 17·6 per cent. compared with a real increase of 15·2 per cent. for England as a whole. Gross capital spending over the same period rose from £115·4 million to £243·3 million—an increase of 19·9 per cent. in real terms.

Since 1979, 64 health building schemes, each costing more than £1 million, have been completed. The schemes include the major developments at Queen Elizabeth and North Tyneside district general hospitals, a new district general hospital at Grimsby, the Countess of Chester nucleus development and phases 1 and 2 of Preston New hospital. The table following sets out the 64 schemes mentioned.

Centrally the Department has provided funds for 15 projects to enable mentally handicapped children to be moved from long stay hospitals. Over £1·5 million has been given to develop five special projects for the mentally ill. This includes £400,000 to develop local community psychiatric services in inner city Leeds. More than £1,600,000 has been given to develop services for the elderly mentally ill. Ten projects have been funded including the creation of a family support unit in South Tees (£403,000) and a daycare and night sitting service in Stockport (£282,000). Over £1 million has been spent on a "Homely Care" scheme for the elderly mentally ill in Liverpool.

Since 1983 more than £2 million has been spent on funding initiatives designed to improve primary health care in inner city areas and to train additional community nursing staff. Twenty two family practitioner committees have computerized their records as part of a national programme to improve services to patients and general efficiency.

Local authority expenditure on personal social services has risen from £335 million in 1978-79 to £709 million in 1984-85—a real terms increase of 19 per cent.

The Department has allocated £4·6 million over three years since 1983 to pump prime 38 projects designed for drug misusers. These include a community based project providing prevention and treatment services in Tyneside (£300,000) and an outpatient clinic in Liverpool (£541,000). An additional £1,391,000 has been given in 1986-87 to be spent specifically on the development of services for drug misusers.

The locality has benefited from the funding of national voluntary bodies under the general scheme of section 64 grants. Additional money has been made available to fund various projects under the initiative "Helping the Community to Care"—designed to encourage voluntary help in the community.

Nine of the 28 projects funded so far in the special "Care in the Community" initiative, designed to encourage the shift of patients from long stay hospitals to the community, are in the locality. A total of more than £4·5 million has been spent. The projects include a home care support scheme for 60 elderly people in Darlington, a project for 32 mentally handicapped people in Fielden and Stanstead View hospitals, one for 20 elderly mentally infirm people from Rainhill hospital and one for 40 mentally ill people in the Ormskirk and Winwick hospitals. A further £1·25 million is expected to be allocated to the locality in the future.

Over £1·75 million has been allocated to 36 projects under the "Under Fives" initiative designed to help families with young children, especially those in low income, socially isolated situations.

More than £5·25 million has been allocated to projects under the "Intermediate Treatment" initiative, designed to offer an alternative to custodial sentencing for young offenders, and in 1985-86 more than £130,000 was assigned to other projects by the Intermediate Treatment Fund committee from its central allocation.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the average housing benefit payments per week in Great Britain in respect of (a) rates, (b) private sector rent and (c) public sector rent;

(2) what is the latest estimate of the number of people receiving assistance under the housing benefit scheme in respect of (a) private sector rents, (b) public sector rents and (c) rates, giving the benefit costs applicable in each of these cases, and the estimated numbers and costs in respect of the changes to take effect in April 1987.

Mr. Lyell: On the basis of local authority subsidy claims, the latest estimates of the current number of people receiving assistance under the housing benefits scheme, the annual cost and the average amount per beneficiary are as follows:

Great Britain, 1986-87

	£'s (millions)	Caseload (millions)	Average Weekly Amount (£)
Rent rebate	2,410	3·75	12·40
Rent allowance	950	1·19	15·40
Rate rebate	1,640	7·12	4·40

All standard housing benefit recipients (around 3·5 million) will be affected by next April's uprating, and total housing benefit expenditure will be an estimated £68 million lower than would otherwise have been the case as a result of the announced measures.

Notes:
Rent rebates represent rent assistance for public sector rents and rent allowances help for private sector rents. Most recipients of help with rents will also receive rate rebates.

Single Payments

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps are being taken to clear the backlog of supplementary benefit single payment claims in the Camberwell, Peckham and Kennington Department of Health and Social Security offices; and what steps are being taken to prepare for the processing of claims likely to be generated as a result of the forthcoming campaign by the welfare benefits resources network on heating additions.

Mr. Lyell: Several measures have been taken to deal with outstanding single payment claims in the Department's offices in Camberwell, Peckham and Kennington (Oval).

Some single payment work from local offices in London south region has been outstationed to the Chatham and Broadstairs offices where 24 additional staff (12 at each office) have been recruited to deal exclusively with this work. Both Chatham and Broadstairs are currently dealing with single payment work from the Kennington (Oval) office and similar work from Peckham will be outstationed to Broadstairs from 18 December 1986. In addition staff have been diverted to this work from other work not connected with the payment of benefit and from the London south regional office.

Camberwell, Peckham, Kennington (Oval) and Kennington park offices have, between them, received an additional 58 staff above the number justified by normal staffing arrangements as their share of the extra 5,000 allocated to local offices this year.

Discussions are continuing between regional management and the welfare benefits resources network about the forthcoming benefits campaign.

Orthopaedic Surgery

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many district health authorities are unable to perform elective orthopaedic surgery; and if he will give a comparable list for 1979.

Mr. Newton: During 1985, the latest year for which information is available centrally, and in 1979, Halton district health authority was the only district health authority without beds available in the specialty of traumatic and orthopaedic surgery. Mersey regional health authority's provisional decision is to include 32 traumatic and orthopaedic beds in phase III of Halton district general hospital planned for 1992. Currently, Halton residents look towards Chester, St. Helens and Knowsley, Warrington and Liverpool district health authorities for provision of orthopaedic services.

There may also be limited periods when, for short-term reasons, other authorities are unable to perform elective orthopaedic surgery.

Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929

Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he last issued guidance to the South Western regional health authority concerning the implementation of the Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929 in regard to late abortions; and what that guidance was.

Mr. Newton: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friends the Members for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Merchant), for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle), for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) and for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon) on 10 December 1986 at column 214.

National Health Service (Amendment) Act 1986

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he plans to commence implementation of the provisions of the National Health Service (Amendment) Act 1986.

Mr. Newton: Sections 1 and 2 (application of food legislation and health and safety legislation to health authorities and health boards) will come into force on 7 February 1987. No decision has yet been taken on when to implement section 3 (pharmaceutical services). Section 4 (remuneration of the family pratitioner contractor professions) came into force on 7 November. Section 5 (joint-planning of health services in Scotland) contains two new sections to the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978.

Section 13A came into force on 7 November; section 13B, which provides back-up powers to the present voluntary arrangements for joint-planning of health services in Scotland, will be brought into force only if the voluntary arrangements fail to meet their objectives. The miscellaneous provisions in sections 6 to 8 came into force on 7 November.

Departmental Office, Shettleston

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans there are to build a new office of his Department in Shettleston; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lyell: The Department is considering replacing the existing overcrowded office at Springfield road, Parkhead, with a new office in the Shettleston area of Glasgow. Siting the proposed office in Shettleston will make it more accessible for the public it serves. Some other minor boundary changes affecting neighbouring local offices are also being considered.

NHS (Consultants)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimate he has for each of the last 10 years of the average earnings of National Health Service consultants from private practice.

Mr. Newton: I regret the information requested is not collected centrally.

Senior House Officers

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many doctors have been members of the senior house officer grade in each region for (a) three years or more and (b) five years or more.

Mr. Newton: The information requested is set out in the following table:

Medical senior house officers in NHS hospitals at 30 September 1985:

Health Education Council

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he plans to appoint members of the special health authority replacing the Health Education Council; and how they will be selected.

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend hopes to make an announcement shortly.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what degree of control he expects to exercise over the special health authority replacing the Health Education Council, in terms of funding and programme content; and what is the degree of control currently exercised over the council on comparable matters.

Mr. Newton: Systems of financial control and programme review similar to those operating within the National Health Service were introduced into the Health Education Council in 1985 and they are likely to be carried forward by the new authority.

Benefits

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to seek to remove discrimination by sex in entitlement to state pensions and related benefits.

Mr. Major: Discrimination by sex has already been largely removed from social security benefits. We have no present plans to remove those areas of unequal treatment, such as pension age, which falls outside the scope of European Community Directive 79/7. We are still considering the implications for benefit provision of European Community Directive 86/378, on occupational social security, the main provisions of which must be implemented by January 1993. We have already gone beyond the requirements of this directive in the new pension arrangements introduced by the Social Security Act 1986, which provide for equal annuities for equal premiums in relation to the proceeds of minimum contributions to personal pensions and money purchase employers' pension schemes contracted out of the state earnings-related pension scheme.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many uncleared claims for supplementary benefit, how many items of unlinked post and how many uncleared claims for single payments there were at each local social security office in the London north and south regions at the latest available date; and what were the comparable figures for 1979 and 1983.

Mr. Lyell: Tables giving the information available have been placed in the Library.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current average interval between claim and initial payment for each social security benefit; and what were the comparable figures in 1979 and 1983.

Mr. Lyell: Based on the latest available data the average time taken between the date of claim and when a decision on the claim is made is as follows:

Benefit	1986	1983	1979
Attendance Allowance	8·3 weeks	12·5 weeks	*
Invalid Care Allowance	15·1 weeks	*	*
Mobility Allowance	8·5 weeks	14·5 weeks	13·5 weeks

Information is not available to show the interval between a decision being made and the initial payment nor is information in the form requested available for the remaining social security benefits not listed.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applications for judicial review are currently in process regarding delays in payments of benefits by his Department.

Mr. Lyell: Five.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of claims for supplementary benefit to his Department's Liverpool offices during 1986 were not met within 14 days; and what percentage of total claims this represents.

Mr. Lyell: I shall let the hon. Member have the information available as soon as possible.

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Social services whether he has received advice from the Social Security Advisory Committee on the operation of regulations governing unemployment benefit payments to those regularly engaged in seasonal work; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lyell: The Social Security Advisory Committee has issued a consultation document on the operation of the seasonal workers' regulations and it has set 12 February 1987 as the closing date for responses. I expect that the committee will go on to consider the question and prepare its report in the light of those responses.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claims for supplementary benefit take more than 14 days before payment is made after first applications in each social security office; what proportion of supplementary benefit claims this represents in each office; and what is the average number of weeks delay before supplementary benefit claims are met at each office.

Mr. Lyell: I shall let the hon. Member have the information that is available as soon as possible.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average interval between the lodging of an appeal and the tribunal hearing for each social security benefit in each year.

Mr. Lyell: I refer the hon. Member to tables 49.02A and 49.02B in "Social Security Statistics 1986" (HMSO). Comparable statistics for all social security benefit appeals were not collected prior to April 1984.

Whitley Councils (Trade Union Recognition)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he plans to seek further powers to recognise trade unions within the Whitley council framework.

Mr. Newton: No.

Dental Estimates

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the numbers of estimates scheduled per dentist in each of the months November and December 1981-85 inclusive, and January to October 1986.

Mrs. Currie: Precise information cannot be provided in the form requested. Figures for the number of general dental services dentists are available only on a six-monthly basis up to 1983 and on a quarterly basis thereafter. The figures in the following table have therefore been estimated.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects the report of the Dental Estimates Board for 1985-86 to be published; how many dental estimates for examination and report only were received and processed in each month in 1986, for which figures are available; and how many cases were made using the claim form FP 17E.

Mrs. Currie: We have received the report of the Dental Estimates Board for the year 1985 together with a supplementary report for January to March 1986.

Information on the numbers of examination and report only estimates and FP 17E cases which were scheduled for payment in the first eleven months of 1986 is as follows:

Artificial Limbs and Appliances

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the total cost of the service providing artificial limbs and appliances in each of the last five years; what has been the cost in real terms, after allowing for inflation, in each of these years; and what has been the change in cost in real terms since 1979.

Mr. Major: The total cost (including administration costs) of the limb service are not separately identified but the following is the expenditure incurred on the supply, fitting and repair of artificial limbs in each of the financial years 1979-80 to 1985-86, together with expenditure figures adjusted in line with the annual movement of the retail price index:

Year	Actual Expenditure £	Expenditure at Current prices[1] £
1979-80	18,683,752	28,270,061
1980-81	22,714,884	30,521,126
1981-82	26,453,952	32,210,683
1982-83	28,524,780	33,196,267
1983-84	31,905,404	35,279,925
1984-85	33,136,582	34,539,524
1985-86	36,067,562	36,067,562

[1] Adjusted by reference to the annual movement in the retail price index.

The increase in real terms since 1979-80 is therefore £7,797,501.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in what ways he is proposing to strengthen the management arrangements at the artificial limb and appliance centres; and what progress he has made with his proposals.

Mr. Major: Proposals are being developed to devolve more responsibility, authority and discretion to management at local level in the artificial limb and appliance service in order to improve the services provided for patients.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will detail the action that has been taken to improve the transport arrangements for patients attending artificial limb centres, indicating the improvements that have already been implemented; and if he will estimate the cost of the planned improvements.

Mr. Major: Operational research studies are being undertaken to fully diagnose problems in the movement of patients to, their flow through and return from artificial limb and appliance centres, and to identify possible solutions. Local initiatives to improve transport, in collaboration with local ambulance authorities, are being tested and evaluated at various limb centres with a view to general implementation. As we have not yet completed our research, we are not yet in a position to provide an estimate of any additional costs that may be incurred when improvements are implemented.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services from which organisations and individuals he has received representations regarding the proposal in the McColl report for a management board or special health authority to oversee the artificial limb and appliance centres; if he will indicate which of the representations favoured the proposals and which were opposed; and when he intends to make a decision.

Mr. Major: A wide range of organisations and individuals with an interest in the artificial limb and appliance centre (ALAC) services have now let us have their views on the McColl report and its recommendations. During the formal consultation period 87 submissions were received and representations have been made subsequently by about 330 hon. and right hon. Members and others. A large majority accepted the need for changes in the organisation and management arrangements, but there was no concensus on the structure that was most likely to facilitate the improvements in service delivery which everyone wants to see. Opinion amongst the patients' groups that responded to our invitation to comment was divided between those that expressed a clear preference for the independent management board recommended by the working party and those that saw no particular advantage in it.

A number of suppliers and trades unions involved with the ALAC services favoured some strengthening of management arrangements, but argued that the Department should retain its present responsibilities for them. Most professional interests considered integration with other National Health Service services at local level to be the best way of securing better co-ordination of services at the point of delivery to amputees and wheelchair users. We are considering all the comments that we have received together with the recent Royal College of Physicians' report on physical disability and will take decisions on future organisational arrangements as soon as possible.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy towards the level of resources in real terms to be devoted to the artificial limb and appliance service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: Sufficient resources will be made available to maintain the artificial limb and appliance service at the appropriate level. Financial provision for the year 1987-88 will be put to Parliament in estimates in the usual way. I refer the right hon. Member to the statement that I made on 26 November 1986 at columns 327-34.

Prosthetists (Training)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress is being made with discussions concerning the future training of prosthetists.

Mr. Major: At a meeting of parties interested in the future of prosthetic and orthotic education and training arranged by the Department on 1 October it was agreed to set up a small working party to visit some of the education and training establishments which are running or have expressed an interest in running courses for prosthetists to discuss their proposals. These visits should be completed by the middle of January after which we expect the interested parties to meet again to consider the working party's findings.

Babies (Mortality)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information his Department holds on the seasonal mortality of babies in the first year of life.

Mrs. Currie: The table shows the number of deaths at age under one year by sex and month of occurrence for England and Wales from 1981 to 1985. Statistics of infant mortality by quarter year of registration are published routinely in tables 9 and 21 of "Population Trends", copies of which may be found in the Library.

Health Authorities (Membership Nominations)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answer of 15 December, Official Report, columns 407-8, what form the announcement inviting right hon. and hon. Members to submit nominations for membership of health authorities will take; and when he plans to make the next one.

Mrs. Currie: The terms of office of about half the members of the special health authorities for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals come to an end on 31 March 1988 and those of about half the members of the regional health authorities on 30 September 1988. Announcements inviting right hon. and hon. Members to submit nominations for these appointments will be made about a year in advance although the precise dates have not yet been decided. I have nothing to add on the form of the actual announcement, beyond my reply of 15 December at column 408.

Brookwood Hospital

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what discussions his Department has had with the South-West Thames regional health authority about the method and timing of the disposal of surplus land at Brookwood hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The South West Thames regional health authority is being advised on the sale of surplus land at Brookwood hospital by town planning experts and marketing agents. Exploratory discussions have been held with several prospective purchasers and offers are under consideration. There have been no discussions between the Department and the authority about the method and timing of this disposal.

Health Authorities (Computers)

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) pursuant to his replies to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), Official Report, 8 December, column 71 and 15 December, column 421, on what basis and by whom the tendering companies for the Wessex regional health authority computer contract were selected; what was the nature and extent of the advice sought from PACTEL on this matter; and if he will make a statement;

(2) pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), Official Report, 15 December, column 421, if he will make it his policy to require regional health authorities to employ professional consultants when inviting tenders for computer-based technology contracts; and if he will make a statement;

(3) pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), Official Report,

8 December, column 72, if he will ask the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency to undertake the revision of his Department's guidance to regional health authorities on computer procurement; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he will call for a report from the chairman of Wessex regional health authority on the fulfilment of contractual obligations by Technicon since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Local Offices (Computers)

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects the computerisation of local social security offices to be completed; whether any local offices will have to be closed during the installation of such equipment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lyell: The mainframe computer projects making up the Department's operational strategy are scheduled for implementation by mid 1992 with installation on a national basis beginning in late 1989. These projects include local office project (LOP) system which will replace the existing microcomputer support for supplementary benefit work already in use in the large majority of offices. Arrangements to install mainframe systems are still under consideration and will take careful account of the need to maintain effective service during the implementation period.

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest estimates of the average wastage rates of staff in each grade in each social security region and each local social security office in the London north and south regions; and what were the comparable figures in 1979 and 1983.

Mr. Lyell: The following tables give voluntary resignation rates for 1979, 1983 and 1986 in each social security region for each of the main grades—executive officer/local officer I, clerical officer/local officer II, and clerical assistant. Voluntary resignation rates are not readily available in this detail for higher grades, but would be under 1 per cent. Rates for individual local offices in the two London regions are not available for 1979 and 1983. Neither are they readily available for 1986 and the cost of supplying them would be disproportionate. In any event, in view of the relatively small numbers involved combined with the erratic incidence of wastage, single year figures for any individual local office are of limited significance.

The rates quoted for 1979 and 1983 are based on historical data. The current rates given for 1986 are estimates based on voluntary resignations notified as part of a survey of the reasons staff give for leaving the Department.

Notes
1. Expressed as a percentage of staff in post in each grade in 1979, 1983 and 1986.
2. Between 1979 and 1983 the number of Social Security regions reduced from twelve to seven.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to increase the number of permanent staff at his Department's offices in Liverpool.

Mr. Lyell: There are no immediate plans to change the number of pemanent staff in the Department's offices in Liverpool. A review of staffing levels in the Department's local offices has just been completed. Complements of individual local offices, including those in Liverpool, will be revised in the light of the findings of this review and of the review which is examining all social security tasks to identify further scope for reducing workloads.

Benefits Handbooks

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) when he proposes to publish a revised edition of the supplementary benefits handbook embodying the changes since 1984;

(2) what plans he has to publish an income support handbook comparable to the current supplementary benefit handbook;

(3) if he has any plans to amend appendix 4 of the supplementary benefits handbook in respect of the welfare responsibilities of his staff.

Mr. Major: We have no plans to amend the supplementary benefit handbook before the supplementary benefit scheme is replaced by income support in April 1988. We are currently looking at the whole range of publicity and information produced by the Department in the context of the reforms in the Social Security Act 1986. The question of the publication of an income support handbook will be examined as part of this exercise.

Chief Adjudication Officer (Annual Report)

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he received the annual report of the chief adjudication officer for 1985-86; and when he expects to publish it.

Mr. Lyell: We expect to receive the report shortly; publication will follow as soon as possible thereafter.

Children (Sexual Abuse)

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has about the incidence of child sex abuse in local authority homes; whether he plans any new initiatives in this regard; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Information is not available centrally on the number of child sex abuse cases occurring in local authority homes.

A number of initiatives have been taken recently or are planned, which are intended to lead to improvements in the running of homes. New procedures were introduced last year to enable local authorities to check any criminal background of those who apply to work with children. Following a special departmental inspection of some 150 community homes in England in 1984 recommendations for the improvement of practice in them were issued to local authorities. Regulations expected to be introduced this year will require each community home to have a complaints procedure. A grant of £750,000 has been made to the Open University for a project to develop improving training for residential child care workers.

The Department has in hand a number of initiatives in relation to the handling of child sex abuse cases generally. These include the setting up of consultancy arrangements for agencies on training for professional staff, support of the development of such training and general guidance on inter-agency procedures for the handling of child abuse cases. This guidance which has been issued to local authorities in draft form contains a separate section on child sex abuse.

Nursery Provision

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the expenditure on all nursery provision for under fives in each of the last five years.

Mr. Newton: Local authority gross current expenditure on day nurseries in England for each of the last five years was as follows:

	£ million
1981-82	69·539
1982-83	76·394
1983-84	82·914
1984-85	87·944
1985-86	[1]88·038

[1] Provisional figure.

Information about expenditure on day nurseries in the private and voluntary sectors is not available centrally. The information relating to Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Hospitals

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many new hospitals have been built since 1979 and in which areas; what are the comparative figures for 1974-79; and how many out-patients and in-patients these can accommodate in each case.

Mrs. Currie: From information held centrally the following table compares the number of building schemes, each costing over £1 million, completed between 1974 and 1979, with those at the same cash price level completed since 1979. The in-patient beds provided in these schemes is also shown, but information is not readily available on the extent of out-patient facilities. The comparision cannot be revalued at current price levels because information is not held on schemes below £1 million, but it should be noted that since 1974 the building tender price index has risen from 101 to 224.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list by region all hospitals whose future closure has been approved, the year when it is likely to take effect, and the number of beds that will be lost in each case; and if he will provide similar data regarding future cuts in beds in hospitals which are not being fully closed.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Hanger and Vessa (Legal Actions)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the firms Hanger and Vessa are still pursuing their legal action against his Department; what is the basis of the allegations being made by the firms; what stage of the legal process has been reached; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: It is confirmed that Vessa Ltd. and J. E. Hanger & Co. Ltd. are still pursuing separate claims against the Department for declarations that the Department is legally obliged to continue to deal with them on the basis of certain expired "cost-plus" contracts. The Department rejects such contentions. In the case of Vessa the Department has served its defence and is in the process of seeking an expedited hearing for the action. In the case of Hanger the Department will be serving its defence early in the new year and then intends to apply also for an expedited hearing.

Dental Treatment

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what percentage of total treatment costs is currently borne by the average patient treated in the general dental services;

(2) what percentage of current chargeable treatment costs is borne by the average patient in the general dental services.

Mrs. Currie: It is estimated that the average patient who pays charges pays about 55 per cent. of total treatment costs (including items such as check-ups which are free to everyone) and 65 per cent. of the cost of chargeable items of treatment.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he has received any representations on changing to a proportional system for calculating patients' charges in the general dental services; whether he has any plans to introduce such charges; and whether he will make a statement;

(2) whether he has made any calculations of the necessary proportional charge for dental treatment which would be needed to produce the equivalent level of current revenue; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Charges for routine dental treatment are already based on a proportion of the costs. We have received representations in favour of a wholly proportional system from the British Dental Association, the General Dental Practitioners' Association and from individual dentists. The possibility of changing to such a system was raised in "Primary Health Care—an Agenda for Discussion" (Cmnd. 9771). Comments on proposals in the document are currently being considered.

If a system of wholly proportional charges had been introduced on 1 April 1986 a charge of 71 per cent. for courses of treatment commenced on or after that date would have been needed to raise the current level of revenue.

Diabetics

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to ensure the issue of free needles, syringes and other equipment essential for self-treatment and any other medical treatment for diabetics; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Essential equipment is already available to diabetics free of charge, either on prescription by general medical practitioners or through the hospital service.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now provide blood sugar testing strips and disposable needles and syringes on the National Health Service for diabetics.

Mrs. Currie: Blood glucose testing strips and disposable syringes are already available free on the National Health Service through the hospital service if they are necessary for a patient's treatment.

Fluoride

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to monitor the effects upon health of adding fluoride in the public drinking water in areas which prior to the Water (Fluoridation) Act 1985 did not have it to one part per million.

Mrs. Currie: We monitor the safety and efficacy of new and existing water fluoridation schemes, both for their effects on dental health and other aspects of public health, and plan to continue to do so.

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance he has given to chemists, hospitals, the retail trade and any other affected group about the sale or use of fluoride toothpaste in areas where the level of fluoride in the water has been raised to one part per million.

Mrs. Currie: None. The normal use of fluoride toothpaste in a fluoridated area is not considered to be in any way harmful to health.

Medical Students

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has had, and what discussions have taken place, concerning the admission of American students from Caribbean universities to study medicine in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Guardians Ad Litem

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has to how long it takes guardians ad litem to be appointed after child care proceedings have been initiated; and how long it takes their reports to be provided to the courts;

(2) whether any local authorities have received extra funding to appoint guardians ad litem; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

National Health Service

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list all those district health authorities which have (a) ceased and (b) reduced expenditure on private contract services for each category of private contract work for the National Health Service in the last five years;

(2) what has been the percentage annual increase since 1972 in National Health Service expenditure deflated by movements in National Health Service pay and prices after taking account of (i) demographic change and the increased health service demands from the growing number of elderly people, and (ii) the higher annual cost of medical technology rising faster than inflation.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) in the last year for which information is available, how many persons in each district health authority area had to wait for more than a year for a hip replacement operation; and what percentage is each of these numbers of the total waiting for this operation in that area;

(2) how many persons are currently waiting for coronary bypass, bone marrow, cataract and hip replacement operations in each district health authority area; and what percentage in each case have been waiting for more than a year.

Mr. Newton: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the information he seeks. Waiting list information is available centrally by the specialty of treatment and not by operation.

Homelessness

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration he has given to the report entitled "Homeless Young People in Britain: The Contribution of the Private Sector", a copy of which has been sent to him by Duncan Guthrie, the director of the Disabilities Study Unit; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Board and Lodging

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Service how many persons under the board and lodging rules have had benefit terminated after, respectively, two, four and eight weeks in each region of the country each month since the rules were introduced, and in total since then.

Mr. Lyell: I regret that the information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Irradiated Foods

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the outcome of his consideration of the report on safety and wholesomeness of irradiated foods by the Advisory Committee on Irradiated and Novel Foods.

Mrs. Currie: The Advisory Committee on Irradiated and Novel Foods considered comments received on its report at a December meeting. The committee is now preparing its advice which will be put to Health and Agriculture Ministers. Ministers will then be in a position to give full consideration to the report.

Meningitis

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will provide additional funds for research into meningitis and related bacterial infections; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will provide additional funding for the Public Health Laboratory Service to enable it to produce serum, and to conduct field and clinical trials in the United Kingdom at the earliest possible date in order to combat the present level of meningococcal meningitis.

(3) what account will be taken of existing toxicity trials and tests of Dr. Frasch's trials vaccine for meningococcal meningitis in any consideration given to the licensing of such vaccines in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what results have been obtained, and what progress is being made in combating meningococcal meningitis, as a result of Dr. Carl Frasch's visit in April 1986 to Porton Down;

(5) what co-operation is taking place between British and Norwegian authorities on research on parallel vaccine development for meningococcal meningitis; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The Department has already provided £57,000 to fund current research on meningitis in Gloucestershire, and is always prepared to consider other proposals. No proposal has been received relating to production of blood product serum to treat meningitis. I understand that the Public Health Laboratory Service (PHLS) has already considered and discounted this possibility.

Research is continuing at the PHLS's centre for applied microbiological research (CAMR) Porton Down, to develop a vaccine against group B type 15 strains of meningococcal meningitis (which predominate in this country). CAMR is using the techniques pioneered by Dr. Carl Frasch and colleagues in developing a vaccine against group B type 2 strains of the disease, and trials already conducted on that vaccine will certainly be taken into account so far as they are relevant when any vaccine developed in this country reaches its own clinical trial stage. It has to be emphasised, however, that development of any new vaccine requires long and painstaking work in the laboratory at the outset.

Dr. Frasch attended a meeting on meningococcal vaccines at the PHLS last September, as did experts from Norway and Finland. Information was freely exchanged, and PHLS and the National Institute for Biological Standards and Control will continue to keep in touch with colleagues abroad.

Communicable Diseases (Notification)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the reviews of the present system of notification of communicable diseases.

Mrs. Currie: The system for notification and the diseases required to be notified are kept under continual review by the Department.

Heparin

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many persons received heparin in each of the last five years as a treatment for deep-vein thrombosis; what percentage for each year of those who died from pulmonary embolism were treated with heparin; what are the equivalent percentage figures for other European countries; and what evidence he has on the effects of the increased use of heparin treatment on deep-vein thrombosis and death from pulmonary embolism.

Mrs. Currie: Statistics are not maintained centrally on the treatment received by patients suffering from deep vein thrombosis or pulmonary embolism either in this or any other European country. Heparin is one of a range of treatments available for these conditions, and it is for each patient's doctor to decide whether its use would be appropriate.

No information is immediately available about any evidence relating the increased use of heparin on deep vein thrombosis with death from pulmonary embolism, but further inquiries are being made. I shall write to the hon. Member when these are complete.

NHS (Capital Investment)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the level of capital investment in the National Health Service each year since 1960 at (a) current prices and (b) constant 1986 prices.

Mr. Newton: The information requested is as follows:

NHS Capital Expenditure—England

Year	Cash terms (£m) (a)	At 1985-86 prices (£m) (b)
1960-61	25	19[illegible]

1983-84	751	831
1984-85	844	895
1985-86	922	922

Notes:
1. The figures for 1970-71 and earlier years are income and expenditure based. For 1971-72 and subsequent years the figures are cash based.
2. Comparisons over such a long period cannot be made with precision because of changes in the structure of the NHS and in the method of calculating GDP.
3. The figures in column (b) have been revalued to 1985-86 levels using the GDP deflator.

Hospital Doctors

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current shortage, in numbers and percentage terms, of hospital doctors in each specialty by region.

Mr. Newton: Information on the number of vacant posts is not held centrally for all hospital grades. I am aware of reports of difficulties in filling senior house officer posts in certain specialties. The underlying cause appears to be problems in the hospital medical staffing structure, which our proposals in "Achieving a Balance" are intended to address.

Private Residential Care

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what basis payments in respect of elderly people in private residential care are made to landlords after a person's death.

Mr. Lyell: Benefit entitlement ceases at death. When a person dies before obtaining payment of benefit due for the period prior to death, that benefit may on application be paid or distributed to, or amongst, persons over the age of 16 claiming as personal representatives, legatees, next of kin or creditors of the deceased. It is possible for a proprietor of a residential care home to claim as a creditor where there were unmet accommodation charges at the time of death.

Cancer Treatment

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all the cancer units for treatment of (i) in-patients and (ii) out-patients that have closed since 1979, giving the number of beds involved in each case and the date of closure; and if he will list those cancer units whose closure is now being sought or has been approved but not yet implemented.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Hospitals (Cross Infection Rate)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all information available to him about the cross-infection rate in hospitals over the last seven years.

Mrs. Currie: Estimates of cross infection rates in hospitals as requested are not available.

NHS (Property Sales)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all surplus National Health Service property sold since 1979 in excess of £50,000, the price obtained and the date of sale.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Retirement Pensions

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will indicate the average additional component payable each year since 1978 on top of the basic retirement pension for persons who retired each year since then on average earnings; and what he estimates the additional component will be each year from now until 1998 if prices rise 3 per cent. per year and average earnings rise 5 per cent. per year.

Mr. Major: The information requested is shown in the table. The amounts apply to a person in full-time employment who has consistently earned at the level of average male earnings since 1978, who is not contracted out of the state earnings-related pension scheme, and who retires on 6 April in each year. The amounts are weekly and rounded to the nearest 5p.

AIDS

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will review the disposal of National Health Service property in the light of future needs resulting from the likely spread of AIDS.

Mrs. Currie: Health authorities are responsible for keeping their estates under regular review and disposing of any properties for which there is no future requirement. In discharging this responsibility, we expect authorities to take into account any plans for the development of services for those suffering from AIDS.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to compensate those haemophiliacs who have been infected with AIDS by Factor VIII brought from the United States of America.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether anti-viral lubricant agents will be made freely available for use in conjunction with condoms as an added measure to prevent the spread of the AIDS virus;

(2) whether in the Government's advertising campaign to promote safer sex and the prevention of the spread of AIDS virus he will be advising people to use the anti-viral lubricant agents in conjunction with condoms.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 12 December 1986, c 294]: Current advice is that if a lubricant is used with a condom it is important that it should not weaken the condom material, as can happen with some oil-based gels. It is theoretically possible that anti-viral agents added to lubricants might provide additional protection against HIV (the AIDS virus). Products promoted as anti-viral lubricants require licences under the Medicines Act 1968 and have to be assessed for quality, safety and efficacy: this assessment would also involve consideration of interaction with barrier contraceptives. At present, there are no product licences in force for any anti-viral lubricant for use in conjuction with condoms as a prophylactic against HIV infection.

Social Workers (Deaths)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many social workers were killed on duty in 1978 and in each year since.

Mr. Newton: Information about attacks on social workers in not collected centrally.

Waiting List Admissions

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list those health authorities which in (a) 1984-85, (b) 1985-86 and (c) 1986-87 had at any time to cease or reduce temporarily waiting list admissions in order to cope with emergencies.

Mr. Newton: This information is not collected centrally. There may be limited periods when, for short term reasons, some authorities are unable to perform elective surgery. The urgency with which a particular patient is treated is a matter for the clinical decision of the consultant concerned.

Bacterial Infection (Research)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will be prepared to fund a research project at Edinburgh university department of bacteriology which proposes to investigate a potentially significant area of bacterial infection relating to blood group Antigen non-secretors.

Mr. John MacKay: I have been asked to reply.

Funding towards the cost of the research project to which the hon. Member refers, has been provided by the Scottish Hospital Endowments Research Trust, which is a non-departmental public body. The trust has undertaken to review the progress of the project after one year but the researchers may, if they so wish, apply for further funding either to the trust, or the Medical Research Council.

Patient Care

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the private institutions providing in-patient and out-patient treatment to National Health Service patients and contractual arrangements with health authorities during 1985.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 24 November 1986, c.129-130]: The requested information is given in the table.

Private institutions providing in-patient and out-patient treatment to NHS patients under contractual arrangements with health authorities during 1985.

Statistics

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in respect of the statistics kept and published by his Department, he will publish in the Official Report any changes since 1979 in (a) the statistical series which are published, including those which have been introduced and those which have been dropped, (b) the basis on which any elements in the statistics are estimated, calculated or presented, (c) the periods over which, and the dates on which the series are collected or published and (d) any other respects in the ways in which the statistics are collected, recorded, presented, evaluated, or published; and if he will explain the reasons for any such changes.

Mr. Fowler [pursuant to his reply, 3 December 1986, c. 698]: Changes in statistical series are made when the Government's requirements for statistical information alter and in response to changes in the administrative systems on which some series are based. Such changes are documented in the Department's main statistical publications, in introductions, appendices and the footnotes to tables. The principal changes in statistics since 1979 have been:

Health and Personal Social Services

"Health and Personal Social Service Statistics for England"

As from 1985, the publication "Health and Personal Social Service Statistics for England" is published on a regular annual basis. A number of additional analyses of medical and dental staff by region are now included.

Certain statistical returns on health and personal social services ceased as a result of the report of the Departmental study team in the Rayner review of Government statistical services. Fuller information is given in the following table.

Item	Recommendation Number[1]	Comments
NHS non-medical manpower
Census returns of students in the professions supplementary to medicine	15
The distinction between community health and school health nurses, in the annual returns of primary health care nursing and midwifery staff (SBH2(c))	16
The annual returns of student radiographers by training school (SBH153); the annual returns of teaching staff and students at schools of physiotherapy (SBH154); the annual return of nurses receiving the geriatric lead payment (SBH155), and the annual regional summary census of nursing and midwifery staff (SBH210)	17
NHS medical and dental manpower
The returns on 'joiners and leavers' — both annual (SBH55) and monthly (SBH57)	23
NHS hospital and community health services
Mid-year hospital activity return (SBH1)	33	More detailed information continues to be collected on an annual basis on Form SH3
Quarterly return of sexually transmitted diseases (SBH60)	34	Now an annual return
Census of government owned road vehicles (SBH3)	36	The census was for Department of Transport
Part 2 of return on private patients in NHS hospitals by specialty and admitting consultants (SBH211)	38	Part 1 of return continues unchanged. (Total beds, discharges, attendances)
Part of return on school and child guidance clinics dealing with facilities (20M)	40	Whole return discontinued
Personal social services
Return SSDA103 and parts of return SSDA107 giving (i) statistics on mentally handicapped and mentally ill persons (a) admitted to local authority homes and hostels during the year; (b) resident in voluntary and private homes and hostels during year (ii) detailed information on residential places available for mentally handicapped and mentally ill persons	59
Return on homes and hostels for drug addicts and alcoholics (SSDA111)	60
Part of return SSDA512 giving statistics on: (i) days adult training centres and day centres normally open; (ii) Mentally handicapped persons regularly attending adult training centres and detailed information on places available	61
Part of return on local authority day nurseries opened or closed during the year (SSDA503)	62
Part of return giving detailed statistics on the meals services provided for the elderly and/or physically handicapped by various voluntary organisations and the local authority (SSDA302)	63
Returns on households visited by home helps (SSDA303)	64
Part of return on persons removed from partially sighted register (SSDA902)	66	Information on registered handicapped persons is now collected triennially rather than annually

Item	Recommendation Number[1]	Comments
Parts of returns SSDA104 and SSDA108 giving (i) detailed information about places, staffing and financial support of children in community homes with education on premises; (ii) information on community homes other than those with education on premises or assessment centres	68
Part of returns on adoption (SSDA907) and adoption orders (SSDA907B)	70	SSDA907 has now been discontinued in favour of a new return which is completed in the course of the adoption process and analysed by OPCS
Return on financial assistance to children towards expenses of maintenance, education and training (SSDA905)	71

[1] The numbers are those of recommendations in the Review of Government Statistical Services—report of the DHSS study team.

A series of statistical bulletins was issued as from 1984 mainly related to hospital statistics. Full information was given in the reply from my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney) to my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) on 10 July at columns 273-276.

Health Service

Certain booklets containing manpower statistics have been discontinued, for example, those relating to nursing and midwifery staff were last published in respect of the 1981 census, those to other staff groups in respect of the census for the previous year. These statistics are, however, freely available in the Library and an 'ad-hoc' service provides information on demand in the most suitable form for the user.

Performance Indicators for health authorities were first published in book form in 1983. Since then the number of indicators has been increased and they are now available on floppy disk. Copies are held in the Library, and print-outs can be obtained. Further information on the basis on which this information is collected was given in the reply from my hon. Friend the Minister for Health to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on 21 October 1986 at columns 867-868.

Social Security

Social Security Statistics

The changes made in this publication are mainly due to changes in legislation, the introduction or abolition of benefits, or as a result of general improvements to meet the needs of customers. For example:

—New tables were produced on retirement pension and widow's benefit following the introduction of SERPS.

—Tables on prices and earnings were amended as a result of the abolition of earnings related supplement.

—Summary tables on claims were added as a result of customer requests to summarise trends in claims and recipients of various benefits.

—New tables were introduced following the operation of the housing benefit scheme in April 1983.

Annual Statistical Enquiry (Supplementary Benefit)

Before 1979 only summary figures were published. After 1979 and commencing with the figures from the 1982 enquiry a full tabulated set of results has been placed in the Library. Starting with the results from the 1983 enquiry this volume has also been available to the general public. Changes in individual series have reflected changes in the regulations governing benefit entitlement.

Low Income Family Statistics

Before 1979 this series appeared annually but since 1979 the tables have been published biennially. When the 1983 figures were released in July 1986, it was also announced that a technical review of the methods and assumptions underlying the construction of this series was taking place and its findings would be incorporated in future editions of the tables.

Tax Benefit Tables

These tables have usually been published twice a year, reflecting changes to tax rates in April and benefit upratings in November. With the alignment of these two processes in April 1987 the tables will be released once a year. From the April 1985 edition the range of illustrative family types was extended to include small families with older children.

Office of Population Censuses and Surveys

Considerably more information was made available on—

Fertility statistics (including a new series of conception statistics).

Births and deaths analysed by area (including analyses by wards from 1981).

Decennial Supplement on Occupational Mortality (but less commentary).

Hospital In-Patients Enquiry.

General Practice Morbidity Statistics.

1981 Census (particularly for small areas).

Other changes include—

Ethnic minority population estimates: new series were introduced from 1981.

Population projections for the counties of the United Kingdom: biennial frequency was adopted instead of annual from 1979 (following Rayner Review) but more details were made available.

Rubella associated terminations of pregnancy: (annual series were introduced from 1974).

Congenital Malformation: new series were introduced from 1971.

Deaths related to sport: annual series were introduced from 1982.

Voters in local government elections: the annual series was dropped from 1980 (following Rayner Review).

Low-income Families

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will retabulate the data on low-income families given in the answer of 25 July on a male-female basis according to the following age groups: under pension age, less than 20, 20 to 29, 30 to 44 and 45 plus years and over pension age, 60 to 64, 65 to 69, 70 to 79 and 80 plus years.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 8 December 1986, c. 70]: The readily available information is shown in the following table:

Low-income families 1983—Number of families[1] appearing in the tables by sex and age of head

Note:
[1] A family is defined in terms of the assessment unit for supplementary benefit, ie a single person or married couple with their dependent children, if any. (Dependent children are those aged less than 16 or 16-19 and still in full-time non-advanced education.)

Birth Statistics

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for the years 1982 to 1985 the estimated percentages of women delivered in (a) England and (b) England and Wales, whose deliveries were (i) spontaneous, including abnormal presentation of head and breach spontaneous, (ii) instrumental (forceps, vacuum and breach extraction), (iii) by caesarean section and (iv) other and unspecified means.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 9 December 1986, c. 126]: The information is given in the table. Data for 1985 are not yet available.

Statistical Information

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all the changes that have been made since 1979 in his Department in the presentation of statistical information; and what further changes are now planned.

Mr. Fowler [pursuant to his reply, 10 December 1986, c. 215]: For past changes in the presentation of statistical information I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) today.

All statistics and the form in which they are presented are kept under continuous review and further planned changes included those associated with the following:

—the implementation of the recommendations of the steering group on health services information, for example the replacement of the hospital in-patients enquiry by a new source;

—the on-going reviews of personal social service statistics collected from the local authorities;

—other reviews; eg, the technical review of low income statistics; —legislative changes relating to benefits following the implementation of the Social Security Act 1986;

—the publication of more material in Statistical Bulletins; —proposal for special volumes by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys giving a long-run of historial data for births, marriage and divorce, and mortality.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 13 January 1987

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

University Maintenance

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he is taking to provide funds for university maintenance.

Mr. Walden: In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) on 6 November 1986, at columns 487-96, my right hon. Friend announced that the Government would increase university recurrent grant by 7·2 per cent. between the financial years 1986-87 and 1987-88. Within the increased funding my right hon. Friend said that he expected the University Grants Committee to make provision for a number of particular improvements, including essential repairs and maintenance of plant and buildings.

TRANSPORT

Transport Supplementary Grant

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether, further to his announcement of proposals for the 1987-88 transport supplementary grant settlement on 17 December, he is now in a position to make clear his intentions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I am pleased to announce that I intend to accept £360 million of expenditure for transport supplementary grant in 1987-88 at a flat rate of 50 per cent. This £180 million of grant is an increase of almost 10 per cent. over 1986-87. It means that I can both maintain my commitment to support schemes accepted in previous settlements and accept a large number of new schemes.

Most of the committed schemes are already under construction or starting in 1986-87. With TSG support to their road programmes, local authorities have already reported for 1985-86 completion of 60 major schemes—those costing £1 million or more—with a total value of £200 million and a start of works on 68 schemes costing £360 million. During 1986-87 they plan to complete a further 49 major schemes costing £150 million and start 76 costing £350 million.

I also intend to accept 70 new schemes costing £350 million, including important improvements such as the Harrogate-Knaresborough bypass; a further section of the Blackwater Valley route; Regent Road, Salford; Merton relief road and the Coventry Road juction of the middle ring road in Birmingham.

The programmes on roads of more than local importance accepted for TSG are important because they save lives, reduce congestion and relieve communities from the effects of through traffic. They help the national economy by aiding the efficient flow of goods, people and services. TSG reflects the national taxpayer's interest in helping local authorities to improve roads carrying heavier longer distance traffic such as those on the country's primary route network or major urban roads which must be adequate in quality and capacity to complement our trunk roads and motorways. The Department's commitment to maintain support in succeeding years providing progress is satisfactory gives authorities the confidence to plan and finance major schemes where they are needed.

European Road Safety Year is over, but I want road safety to remain high on the agenda. Many smaller schemes on these heavily trafficked roads often produce very significant accident savings amongst other benefits. Timely investment in smaller schemes may also avoid the need for more substantial works at a later date, giving further benefits to the community. To encourage this worthwhile work, I have taken into account some £55 million of expenditure on minor works for grant in 1987-88, £14 million more than 1986-87.

Settle-Carlisle Railway Line

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, before reaching a decision about the future of the Settle to Carlisle line, he will publish the financial case for closure submitted to him by British Rail.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have now written to the hon. Member with a copy of the financial information published by the board, copies of which have been placed in the Library today.

British Airways

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a further statement about the British Airways offer for sale.

Mr. Moore: A pathfinder prospectus was published on 8 January. Copies are available in the Library and in the Vote Office.

Preliminary registration statements are being filed in the United States, Canada and Japan. I intend to offer the shares for sale on Thursday 27 January and the last date for receipt of applications will be Friday 6 February.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Talks (Tokyo)

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the outcome of his talks with the Japanese Ministry of Posts and Telecommunications during his visit to Tokyo; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: In my talks in Tokyo I emphasied Her Majesty's Government's full support for the bid by Cable and Wireless and the IDC consortium to establish a second Japanese international telecommunications carrier alongside KDD. I pressed for the merits of the proposals from the various consortia to be fully assessed and urged against premature decisions being taken on an issue very important to the demonstration of Japanese commitment to international trade and industrial collaboration. These points have since been confirmed in a note.

Patent Office

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans for the Patent Office in the legislative programme for 1986-87; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: As announced in the White Paper "Intellectual Property and Innovation" (Cmnd. 9712) the Government propose to hive off the Patent Office and establish it as a non-departmental non-Crown public body. Legislation to implement this and other proposals of the White Paper will be introduced when the parliamentary timetable permits.

Lloyd's (Committee of Inquiry)

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the report of the Committee of Inquiry into regulatory arrangements at Lloyd's will be published.

Mr. Butcher: Arrangements for publication of the committee's report are in hand. I am expecting that it will be possible for it to be published on Thursday 22 January.

Sub-Postmasters' Compensation Fund

Sir Philip Holland asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any plans to amend the conditions of the sub-postmasters' compensation fund; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: I met the general secretary and other representatives of the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters today to discuss particularly the terms of the Government's special £2 million compensation fund for sub-postmasters. The fund was established, following an announcement in the House on 13 May 1983 by the then Secretary of State for Industry, my right hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin), to help smaller sub-post offices that were adversely affected by changes in the arrangements for the payment of social security benefits. The fund was due to be closed on 30 April this year.

In March last year, the general secretary wrote to me suggesting that the conditions of the fund, particularly the closing date, might be changed. After consulting the Post Office, I have decided that in recognition of the exceptional circumstances caused by industrial action within the DHSS in 1984-85, which considerably distorted sub-postmasters' work levels for about a year, the fund should be extended by one year to 30 April 1988. I have told the federation that the new expiry date must be regarded as final and that we could not entertain the possibility of a further extension.

The opportunity has also been taken to update the guidelines, which explain the background to the fund and qualification criteria, to reflect recent changes in sub-postmasters' conditions of employment. I am making arrangements for copies of the revised guidelines to be placed in the Library and to be available from my Department.

Textiles

Mr. Cash asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the adoption of Community regulations implementing the Community's 26th bi-lateral agreement with textile supplying countries and introducing quota restrictions on imports from Taiwan.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 2 December 1986 the House debated a decision (document 9809/86) relating to the Community's signature of the protocol of the multi-fibre arrangement (MFA) and a decision (document 10720/86) on the provisional application of the Community's bilateral textile agreements with certain third countries from 1 January 1987.

The Commission subsequently submitted to the Council its proposals for three regulations, the first setting out the detailed provisions governing the implementation of the above agreements under the MFA with certain third countries, the second with Yugoslavia and the third its proposed regulation concerning quotas on imports from Taiwan. The House of Commons Select Committee on European Legislation considered these three proposed regulations on 17 December 1986 and recommended them for further consideration by the House. I regret it was not possible to arrange the debate before the House rose on 19 December: But since the House had already debated the policy implications of the MFA on 2 December, and since the maintenance of a scrutiny reserve would have prevented implementation of the measures on 1 January 1987, thereby damaging United Kingdom industry, I was satisfied that, in accordance with the terms of the resolution of the House of 30 October 1980, there were special reasons why adoption should not be delayed until after the debate recommended by the Scrutiny Committee. I therefore agreed to the adoption of the three regulations on 22 December 1986. A debate on the regulations will be arranged as soon as possible.

Unipart and Leyland Bus

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress on the privatisation of Unipart and Leyland Bus.

Mr. Giles Shaw: On 24 July 1986, my right hon. Friend announced that agreement in principle had been reached on the sale of Unipart and, separately, Leyland Bus to management-led consortia. I am pleased to announce that the contractual arrangements relating to both sales have now been completed.

Unipart has been acquired by UGC Ltd, a consortium of its management and employees and a group of institutional investors. Employees of Unipart are being given the opportunity to subscribe for a 12 per cent. interest in UGC whilst the Unipart managers' share in the company may rise from an initial 10 per cent. to 20 per cent. if performance targets are met.

On Leyland Bus, it was contemplated in July that the management consortium would purchase Leyland Bus and 33 per cent. of Leyland Parts for a sum of £11·7 million. Following detailed negotiations, it has now been determined that the management consortium will purchase Leyland Bus for a sum of £4 million, subject to audit. Leyland Parts will, however, remain within Leyland Vehicles Ltd, continuing to market bus parts on behalf of the privatised bus company. Appropriate contractual arrangements have been negotiated between the parties. Employees are to be given an opportunity to own shares in the business on a basis to be determined.

The Government hope that the new private sector companies will take advantage of these opportunities to develop viable and successful enterprises.

ENVIRONMENT

Private Housing

Mr. Bendall asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will take any further steps to improve the prospects for the private rented sector, especially in London.

Mr. John Patten: I have today laid before the House two orders under the Housing Act 1980. The first of these repeals the provisions of the Rent Act 1977 and the rent (Agriculture) Act 1976 which require any increase in a fair rent for a regulated tenancy set by a rent officer or a rent assessment committee to be phased over two years. Because inflation has fallen to such a low level, there is no longer any justification for delaying full payment of any rent increase when awarded. This should improve marginally the return available to private landlords from fair rents. At the same time, tenants who are eligible for housing benefit will of course receive benefit at once on any higher rent.

The second order amends the Housing Act 1980 so as to remove the requirement on a landlord in the Greater London area who is letting a property under shorthold to register a fair rent for the property. This requirement was abolished in 1981 for properties outside the Greater London area. It will still be open to either landlord or tenant for a property let on shorthold in the Greater London area to apply for a fair rent to be registered. I hope that this will encourage owners keeping property empty in London to now let it, secure in the knowledge that they will be able to obtain vacant possession.

Building Research Establishment

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the achievements and publications since 11 June 1984 of the structural integrity division of the Building Research Establishment; and what is its current programme of work.

Mr. John Patten: Since 11 June 1984 the structural integrity division of the Building Research Establishment has been engaged mainly on continuing investigations, but with the addition of a major new programme of investigations of large panel system dwellings in collaboration with other divisions throughout the establishment. There have been 43 publications, of which 13 were concerned with system built dwellings, 17 with the performance and durability of masonry, three with the disposal of radioactive waste, five with the principles of codification and control, three with durability of cement based products and two with use of colliery spoil to backfill limestone mines.

The integrity investigations continue to assess the implications of structural failures and developments in design and construction but, in addition, there has been an emphasis on investigation of the implications for dwellings of deterioration or poor quality of construction. Since June 1984, 10 investigations have been completed, arising from actual or potential deterioration or poor quality construction, including five types of prefabricated reinforced concrete housing.

The current programme of work includes 17 integrity investigations of various sizes, arising from failures, structural deterioration, innovations and new requirements. The programme also includes the necessary research drawing where appropriate on other parts of the establishment, and response to inquiries and issues arising from publications.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the work since June 1984 of the visitors panel of the Building Research Establishment; and whether he will list the current members of the panel.

Mr. John Patten: The panel's work has greatly assisted the director BRE in assessing and monitoring the quality of the establishment's research. The two annual reports so far submitted have made a valuable contribution to my Department's thinking on the establishment's future.

Members of the panel are:

Dr. R. E. Rowe CSE
Professor R. W. K. Honeycombe FRS
K. Newman BSc MICE
D. Quinlan BSc
P. A. Green BSc FICE
D. W. Lazenby DIC FICE FIStruct.E
C. Izzard FCIBS
Professor V. B. Torrance

Dr. W. W. L. Chan

Housing Associations

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what directions have been given by him to the Housing Corporation about charitable housing associations' voluntary sales policy and registration with the corporation.

Mr. Tracey: None.

Royal Mint

Mr. Andrew Faulds asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why he did not accept the advice of the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission that he call in for public inquiry the proposed building works at the grade II listed building housing the Royal Mint.

Mr. Waldegrave: The notification and advertisement procedures which apply to listed building consent applications are so designed to allow members of the public, local conservation bodies and the national amenity societies an opportunity to make representations. These procedures were followed and representations were received which identified the issues involved. The HBMC indicated that it was minded to authorise listed building consent, though it considered that a case for call-in existed. Having had regard to all the representations, it was not thought that a public inquiry was necessary and no overriding reason was seen to remove jurisdiction from the Tower Hamlets borough council and the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission.

Hamilton Development (Leicester)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many representations he has received (a) in favour and (b) against the proposed new development at Hamilton in north-east Leicester;

(2) what criteria he used in assessing the need for a large scale housing development at Hamilton in the Leicester, East constituency; and on what basis he considered such a development as environmentally desirable;

(3) what is his policy concerning the construction of large council housing estates; and how this policy is applied to the proposed Hamilton plan in Leicester.

Mr. Tracey: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Newham

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the housing investment programme allocation for the London borough of Newham for each of the last five years.

Mr. Tracey: I shall answer this question shortly.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the level of rate support grant in cash terms for the London borough of Newham for each year since 1979.

Mr. Chope: The rate support grant paid to the London borough of Newham in respect of the years 1979-80 to 1986-87 inclusive are as follows in cash terms.

	£ million
1979-80	51·5
1980-81	60·3
1981-82	63·3
1982-83	74·0
1983-84	74·8
1984-85	70·7
1985-86	66·2
1986-87	74·1

Notes:

The figures for 1979-80 and 1980-81 are not comparable with those for 1981-82 to 1986-87 because they comprise the needs, resources and domestic elements whereas from 1981-82 onwards the figures comprise block grant and domestic rate relief grant.

The figures for 1981-2 to 1985-86 are not comparable with those for 1986-87 because of the abolition of the GLC on 31 March 1986.

All figures are in cash terms. Those for 1979-80 to 1982-83 are final entitlements. Domestic rate relief grant figures for 1983-84 and 1984-85 are final entitlement; those for 1985-86 and 1986-87 are first estimates. Block Grant figures for 1983-84 and 1984-85 are entitlements after holdback based upon provisional outturn; those for 1985-86 are entitlements after holdback based on budgets; those for 1986-87 are entitlements based on initial budget returns.

Anti-Fouling Paint

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the results of the first year's monitoring programme for TBT in the aquatic environment; and what further action he proposes to take.

Mr. Waldegrave: Preliminary results from the first year's monitoring programme indicate that the water target concentration for TBT of 20 nanograms per litre has been exceeded in six of the nine estuaries studied, at some time during the year; and that at a number of sites on the Broads with high densities of pleasure boats, levels significantly above this target concentration have been found.

The monitoring programme will continue during 1987 and will be modified to cover new areas of concern. In particular, an expanded survey of the Broads area is to be carried out in conjunction with Anglian water authority. The detailed results of the monitoring programme will be published in the scientific literature in the normal way.

I have written to the Paintmakers Association to advise it of our continuing concern over the problems caused by the use of organotin-based anti-fouling paints on small boats. I have warned it that unless there is a marked improvement in the monitoring results in the first half of the year — which I am advised seems unlikely — the Government will have to consider further measures later on this year. This might include a ban on the use of some of all organotin compounds in anti-fouling paints intended for small boats.

In relation to the current problem with the Broads, I have specifically asked the association to consider immediate restrictions on the marketing of TBT-based paints in the Broads area in favour of existing alternatives. In addition, the Broads Boat Hirers Association and the British Marine Industries Federation have agreed to participate in a separate initiative to persuade boat owners on the Broads to minimise the use of TBT anti-fouling paints during the 1987 season.

Homelessness

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the Report entitled "Homeless Young People in Britain: The contribution of the Private Sector", a copy of which has been sent to him by Duncan Guthrie, the director of the Disabilities Study Unit; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987]: Young people stand to benefit from a number of Government measures in the housing field. I gave details in my answer of 26 November, at column 263, to my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins).

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what research on nuclear waste management or disposal has been carried out at Potton Island, Essex.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have been asked to reply. None.

PRIME MINISTER

EC (Financial Problems)

Q181. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will propose to the next meeting of the European Council that consideration be given to the financial problems of the Community; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I doubt if this will be necessary. The Community's financial problems are certain to play a large part in the deliberations of the European Council and the Council of Ministers this year.

Engagements

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 13 January.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 13 January.

Mr. Canavan asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 13 January.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 13 January.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Hong Kong

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the new governor of Hong Kong to be appointed.

Mrs. Chalker: An announcement will be made as soon as possible.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list in the Official Report the salary of the governor of Hong Kong in pounds sterling.

Mr. Renton: The salary of the governor of Hong Kong is £93,327 per annum (at an exchange rate of £1:HK$11).

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current salary of the Hong Kong commissioner in London.

Mr. Renton: The current salary of the Hong Kong commissioner in London is HK$686,400 per annum (or £62,400 per annum, at an exchange rate of £1:HK$11).

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Government of China are consulted on the appointment of the governor of Hong Kong.

Mrs. Chalker: No.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the cost of the upkeep of the Hong Kong Government office in London in each of the past five years.

Mr. Renton: The cost of the upkeep of the Hong Kong Governent office in London in each of the current and past four financial years is as follows:

1982-83	HK$24·44 million (about £2·22 million)
1983-84	HK$25·42 million (about £2·31 million)
1984-85	HK$26·19 million (about £2·32 million)
1985-86	HK$24·54 million (about £2·45 million)
1986-87	HK$30·06 million (about £2·78 million)

(The exchange rates used were those in force at the time.)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will make it his policy to seek to ensure that the next governor of Hong Kong be appointed from outside the Diplomatic Service; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what consideration will be given to the appointment of a Chinese as governor of Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Our concern is to ensure that the right person is appointed to this highly important post.

Ambassadors (Salaries)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current salary in pounds sterling of the ambassadors at Washington, Paris, Moscow and Peking.

Mr. Eggar: The annual salaries of Her Majesty's ambassadors at the following posts are:

Washington	72,400
Paris	62,100
Moscow	50,150
Peking	50,150

These salary levels reflect the incumbents' grades.

Spain and Spanish Territories (British Citizens)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the reply of 12 December, Official Report, columns 271-2, regarding the deaths of British travellers in Spain and Spanish territories, if he will provide such information as is available relating to a breakdown of the cause of death in each case identified in 1985 and 1986, and the subsequent outcome of any coroners' inquiries.

Mr. Eggar: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Gary Maher

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will seek to obtain a transcript of the "Face the Facts" programme on BBC Radio 4 of 7 January regarding the death of Gary Maher and the near fatal injuries to his sister Sheree; if he will now make representations to the Spanish Government for the reopening of the inquiries into this case; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will outline the assistance given by Her Majesty's Government to the Maher family following the death of Gary Maher in Tenerife in February 1985, itemising those letters and telexes sent to the Spanish authorities regarding this case.

Mr. Eggar: A transcript of the programme has been made. Successive Governments have followed a policy whereby representations to another Government are considered only if all legal procedures available have been used and there appears to have been a miscarriage of justice. It appears that all legal avenues have not yet been exhausted in this case.

The consular department of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has offered all proper assistance to the Maher family, including an offer of discussions with officials, and will continue to inform them and my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden) of any developments; consular officials remain ready to discuss the case with the Maher family.

Soviet Union (Claims Agreement)

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will outline the arrangements for the distribution of the moneys received from the Soviet Union under the claims agreement of 15 July 1986.

Mr. Eggar: The Foreign Compensation (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (Registration and Determination of Claims) Order 1986 was laid before Parliament on 6 January 1987 and is due to enter into operation on 1 February. It provides for the Foreign Compensation Commission to register claims by British holders of Russian bonds and to determine and value claims by British and Commonwealth applicants wishing to benefit from the original property and personal injury claims registered between 1918 and 1951. Advertisements will shortly be placed in the national press indicating how detailed information may be obtained by potential claimants under the order. It is intended that this order should shortly be supplemented by a further Order in Council setting out the detailed arrangements for the distribution of compensation to successful claimants.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Pensioners (Television Licence)

55. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy towards the relief of all retirement pensioners from the need to pay for a television licence.

Mr. Mellor: We have no plans to propose the exemption of all retirement pensioners from the need to pay for a television licence.

Wheel Clamping

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Leicester, East of 16 December, Official Report, column 484, what were the proceeds from the sale or auction of unclaimed wheel-clamped cars during the last year for which figures are available; what is the approximate cost of trying to trace the owner of an unclaimed vehicle; what is the average cost of clamping a vehicle; what has been the total revenue raised in each year since 1983 from unclamping fees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The commissioner has indicated that the information available on the proceeds from the disposal of unclaimed vehicles does not distinguish between those initially wheel-clamped and those simply removed. In the financial year 1985-86 a total of £23,692 was raised through the sale for scrap or auctioning of all unclaimed removed vehicles. No estimate of the average cost of attempting to trace the owners of unclaimed vehicles is available. The average cost of clamping in the financial year 1985-86 was £22·35. The commissioner estimates that the income from wheel-clamping in each calendar year was as follows:

Period	Revenue £
1983 (from 16 May)	510,400
1984	840,000
1985	681,600
1986 (to 14 November)	686,400

Holloway Prison (Mother and Baby Unit)

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether the new mother and baby unit at Holloway is now in use;

(2) how long the new mother and baby unit at Holloway prison has been ready for use.

Mr. Mellor: The accommodation was completed in 1982; it was taken into use on 17 November 1986.

Women Prisons

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many unsentenced women gave birth while serving custodial sentences in the year 1985-86; and what sentences they eventually received.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Table 4, appendix 7 of the report on the work of the prison department 1985-86 (Cmd. 11) records 71 female inmates temporarily removed to outside hospitals for delivery returning to the establishment afterwards, and one whose delivery took place within the establishment. This delivery accounts for the one live birth recorded in the table.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state (a) how many women in prison are mothers of dependent children, (b) how many dependent children do these women have and (c) how many of these children are aged under 18 months.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. On 11 August 1986, 340 females in custody were known to be the mothers of 455 children aged five years or under, of whom 111 were 18 months or under.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state (a) how many women were in custody with their children on the most recent convenient date, (b) in which prisons these women with their children were held, (c) what were the ages of the children and (d) for what offences these mothers had been imprisoned.

Mr. Mellor: The information is not readily available: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women in prison on the most recent convenient date were known to be pregnant.

Mr. Mellor: On 9 January, 18 adults and 11 youth custody trainees.

Radioactivity

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of north Wales on the items of equipment available for police use in an accident involving radioactive contamination at (a) A Division (Caernarfon), (b) B Division (Llandudno), (c) C Division (Prestatyn) and (d) D Division (Wrexham) of the north Wales police, listing in each case the number of (i) docsimeters, (ii) radiac survey meters, (iii) sets of protective clothing, (iv) breathing units and (v) decontamination units;

(2) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of north Wales on what training the police in (a) A Division (Caernarfon), (b) B Division (Llandudno), (c) C Division (Prestatyn) and (d) D Division (Wrexham) of the north Wales police have received to deal with accidents involving radioactivity; what regular exercises the division carries out to deal with such accidents; and at what intervals such exercises take place;

(3) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of north Wales on what exercises have taken place over the past five years to prepare the police of the north Wales constabulary for (a) an accident involving radioactive contamination and (b) evacuation of the population in the event of the worst case of nuclear reactor disaster under adverse meteorological conditions; and if he will list in each case which units participated.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the statement by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on his strategy for the coming year.

Mr. Hurd: I am placing copies of the commissioner's strategy statement for 1987 in the Library today. I am also sending a copy to all right hon. and hon. Members whose constituencies fall wholly or partly within the Metropolitan police district. I hope to meet London Members soon to discuss the statement.

I have discussed the commissioner's statement with him. The force goal for 1987 is to improve the quality of service to the public by:

(a) the reduction of criminal opportunity through crime prevention, public contact, involvement and co-operation;

(b) (i) the enhanced detection of specific criminal offences (for example, robbery, burglary, drug misuse, racial attacks, sexual offences against women and vandalism) in accordance with locally or centrally identified priorities;

(ii) a concerted attack on organised crime and the elimination of profits therefrom;

(c) the enhanced support, care and concern for victims of crime including the victims of domestic violence;

(d) improved effectiveness both in the preservation of public tranquility through closer community-police relations and in the policing of public disorder through better tactical control, communications, equipment and training.

I welcome the new emphasis on the care and support of victims of domestic violence, and the enhanced detection of sexual offences against women.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Public Expenditure White Paper

Mr. Soames asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he intends to publish the 1987 public expenditure White Paper.

Mr. MacGregor: "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1987-88 to 1989-90" (Cmnd. 56, Vols I and II) will be published at noon on Wednesday 14 January, and copies will be available in the Vote Office.

Inland Revenue (Lloyd's Syndicates)

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been reached on negotiations with the Inland Revenue on its assent to the settlement of Lloyd's insurance with underwriters in the syndicates managed by Peter Cameron Webb.

Mr. Ian Stewart: It is not the case that the settlement of Lloyd's internal matters depends on the Revenue's assent. Discussions are proceeding with a view to settling all the outstanding tax liabilities of members of Lloyd's as soon as possible.

Overseas Investment

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the level of overseas investment in both current and constant price terms each year since 1960, with direct and portfolio investment differentiated for each year.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987]: Annual information on the current value of transactions involving investment overseas by United Kingdom residents, distinguishing direct and portfolio investment, between 1964 and 1985 inclusive is given at table 1·4 of the "United Kingdom Balance of Payments" 1986 edition (The CSO Pink Book), a copy of which is in the Library. Later information up to the third quarter of 1986 is given in the press notice on the United Kingdom balance of payments issued on 4 December 1986.

Comparable information prior to 1964 and figures at constant prices are not available.

Personal Incomes

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the gain or loss to those with incomes (a) under £5,000, (b) £5,000 to £10,000, (c) £10,000 to £15,000, (d) £15,000 to £20,000, (e) £20,000 to £30,000, (f) £30,000 to £50,000, (g) £50,000 to £70,000 and over £70,000 a year as a result of each Finance Act since 1979, both in aggregate and per person on average in each of these categories, in each case indicating how much is due to indexation and how much is real gain.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1986]: The information is in the tables. For each financial year shown, the tables compare the yield from the tax regime in that year with the 1978-79 tax regime. All estimates are calculated on a provisional estimate of the 1986-87 tax base and all tax regimes have been indexed to 1986-87 levels by reference to the statutory formula. The comparisons therefore allow for budgetary changes in income tax rates and allowances, but not for any changes since 1978-79 in the definition of the income tax base.

The first table shows the total reduction (+) or increase (−) in tax yield from each income range; and the second table shows the average change for individual tax units.

As child tax allowances were being phased out in 1978-79, they have been excluded from the comparison.

It is not possible to provide useful estimates of the liabilities in 1986-87 for the 1978-79 regime without indexation since Inland Revenue records do not cover many of the people who would be brought into tax by such low levels of personal allowances. A partial analysis with incomplete coverage would be misleading.

[2] Average gains and losses are calculated by reference to the estimated number who would be liable to pay tax under the indexed 1978-79 regime; this number is some 900,000 greater than the numbers paying tax in 1986-87, some 750,000 in the income range below £5,000 and 150,000 in the range £5,000 to £10,000.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Incontinence

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what initiatives his Department takes in advising medical schools to provide training for medical practitioners in the care of the incontinent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: The content of undergraduate medical education is a matter for universities within broad guidelines laid down by the General Medical Council.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) to what extent he encourages the provision of district continence nurse advisers; what encouragement he gives for the development of such services; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what advice, encouragement and guidance his Department gives for the establishment of walk-in or self-referral continence clinics; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will take steps to ensure that minimum acceptable standards of care for incontinent persons are available within each district health authority in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: It is for the health and social services boards to assess and decide the type and level of provision required and the priority they attach to the development of incontinence services in the light of local needs and circumstances. Whilst I would expect health and social services boards to provide acceptable incontinence services, I do not intend to set minimum standards of care for incontinent persons or to offer advice to boards on the appointment of continence nurse advisers and the establishment of clinics.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if his Department will provide vocational courses on the control and care of incontinent persons for general practitioners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: The Department, through the Northern Ireland Council for Postgraduate Medical Education, provides a comprehensive range of courses covering all fields relevant to general practice. Incontinence is included as a module in several of these courses.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give an estimate of the number of male incontinent persons in the age brackets 15 to 64 and 65-plus years in Northern Ireland; if he will give the same estimates for females; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: No reliable estimates are currently available.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what advice his Department gives to health authorities regarding the importance of medical-surgical management and nursing care management of incontinent patients; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what advice he gives regarding the provision of continence advice and service; what information he has on variations in care of incontinent patients from one area to another; if he will write to each health board concerning provision for the treatment of incontinence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: The management and treatment of incontinence is a matter for professional medical and nursing staff. Information on the care of incontinent patients is not collected centrally. The Department of Health and Social Services recognises the important contribution which the correct treatment and management of incontinence makes to the well-being of incontinent patients and co-operates with professional bodies in the provision of suitable training for staff. I have no plans to write to health and social services boards on this subject.

EMPLOYMENT

Sheltered Placement Scheme

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Paymaster General how many people in the north-east region of Yorkshire were employed under the sheltered placement scheme.

Mr. Lee: On 5 January 1987, there were six people in the north-east region of Yorkshire who are employed under the sheltered placement scheme.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Paymaster General what was the cost of the sheltered placement schemes for disabled people in 1986; and what will be the estimated cost for 1987.

Mr. Lee: The estimated cost of the sheltered placement scheme to central Government in the calendar year 1986 is £5·4 million. Decisions have not yet been taken on the level of central Government spending on the scheme in 1987-88.

Disabled People

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Paymaster General (1) if his Department will make arrangements with the Department of Health and Social Security whereby disabled people attending employment rehabilitation courses could continue to receive their social security benefits including housing benefit;

(2) if he will require the Manpower Services Commission to increase rehabilitation allowances in excess of state benefits as an incentive for clients to attend rehabilitation courses.

Mr. Lee: I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Paymaster General how many people have been registered as unemployed in the London borough of Newham in each year since 1979.

Mr. Lee: Following is the available information, which is also in the Library. The table shows the numbers of unemployed claimants in the London borough of Newham in November of each year since 1983. The comparison is affected by the change in the compilation of the unemployment statistics in March 1986. Statistics of unemployment for local authority districts are derived from the ward-based system and are available only from June 1983.

	Number
November 1983	15,993
November 1984	16,509
November 1985	17,191
November 1986	17,187

Employee Involvement Statements

Mr. Watts asked the Paymaster General what further conclusions he has drawn from more recent employee involvement statements in company directors' reports in accordance with section 235 and schedule 7 of part V of the Companies Act 1985.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have today placed a survey of a sample of recent reports in the Library of the House. It indicates that more companies are reporting a wide range of employee involvement arrangements than we observed previously.

National Advisory Council on Employment of Disabled People

Mr. Watts asked the Paymaster General whether the National Advisory Council on Employment of Disabled People has been reconstituted.

Mr. Lee: My right hon. and noble Friend has reconstituted the National Advisory Council on Employment of Disabled People for a further period of three years from 1 January 1987.

The members of the reconstituted council are:

Chairman
Mr. F. A. Baker, CBE

Members appointed after consultation with employers' organisations
Mr. J. A. F. Bruce
Dr. I. M. Dawson, MB, BS, MFOM, DIS
Mr. D. G. Dodds, CBE
Mr. J. K. Gillespie
Mr. J. W. Threadingham, MBE

Members appointed after consultation with the TUC
Mr. M. A. Barrett
*Ms. O. Davies
Ms J. Grant
Mr. J. L. Jones, CH, MBE
Mr. R. R. Webster

Local Authority Representative
Mr. D. James

Independent Members
*Mr. D. Blezard, OBE
*Mr. I. W. Bruce, BSC, AMBIM
*Mrs. S. M. Harold, MA, FBIM, MBcS, F Inst D, MIDPM
Mr. C. Heginbotham, BSc, MSc
*Mrs. A. Hill, CBE
*Mr. P. Large, MBE
Mrs. M. MacKenzie, MBE, TD
Mr. T. B. Owen, CBE, MA
Dr. J. R. Oxley, MRCP
*Mr. T. V. F. Papé, BSc
*Dr. J. Sandhu, Dip AD, M Des RCA, B Ed, FSIAD, FRSA
Mr. A. Smith, FIPM
*Dr. J. F. Taylor, MBChB, DPH, DIH, MFOM
*Mrs. W. L. Tumin, MA, Dip Soc Stud, Dip Ling
*Mr. P. A. A. Waring, MSc
Mr. G. Wilson, MBE, MA

* New members of the council

I would like to take this opportunity of thanking the council for the valuable advice it continues to offer in this important area.

Employment Prospects

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Paymaster General if he will estimate the effect on employment prospects of (a) the free trade zones and (b) the enterprise zones.

Mr. Lee: There are no free trade zones in the United Kingdom. However, in 1984 six freeports were designated as an experiment to test their usefulness as a stimulus to economic activity. Their designation was not primarily intended or presented by the Government as an employment or job creation initiative. However, at 1 July 1986 around 100 persons were directly employed full-time in the freeports.

Britain's 23 enterprise zones had 53,500 employees in December 1985, some 20,000 of these jobs having been created since designation, and there is no reason to suppose that the good progress made so far cannot be continued. Comprehensive information on enterprise zones is contained in the Department of the Environment's report "Enterprise Zone Information 1984-1985", a copy of which is in the House of Commons Library.

WALES

Incontinence

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what initiatives his Department takes in advising medical schools to provide training for medical practitioners in the care of the incontinent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The Department has no direct involvement in the academic content of courses arranged by the University of Wales college of medicine.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) to what extent he encourages the provision of district continence nurse advisers; what encouragement he gives for the development of such services; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what advice, encouragement and guidance his Department gives for the establishment of walk-in or self-referral continence clinics; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will take steps to ensure that minimum acceptable standards of care for incontinent persons are available within each district health authority in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Whilst I would expect all health authorities to provide acceptable incontinence services, I do not intend to prescribe in detail how such services should be provided or set specific standards of care, since it is for individual authorities to decide for themselves both the level of provision, and the pace and direction of further developments in their services, in the light of their local needs and circumstances.

In 1977, the Welsh Office wrote to all health authorities advising them that the management of incontinence should be clearly identified as the responsibility of a designated special nurse, who should act as a "resource person" for nurses working in hospitals and the community services. Since then, most district health authorities have appointed at least one continence adviser. Community nurses also provide advice and assessment as part of their nursing duties.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if his Department will provide vocational courses on the control and care of incontinent persons for general practioners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The Department does not directly provide vocational courses in any medical or surgical discipline, and would not wish to interfere in the excellent facilities for continuing education already available.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give an estimate of the number of male incontinent persons in the age brackets 15 to 64 years an 65 plus in Wales; and if he will give the same estimates for females; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The specific information requested for Wales is not available centrally.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what advice his Department gives to health authorities regarding the importance of medical-surgical management and nursing-care management of incontinent patients; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what advice he gives regarding the provision of continence advice and service; and what information he has on variations in care of incontinent patients from one area to another; if he will write to each health authority concerning provision for the treatment of incontinence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Although data about incontinence services in particular districts are not routinely collected, information about these services is regularly included in the reports of the Health Advisory Service, and is also obtained informally by the Department's own officers.

There has been a growing awareness in recent years of the important contribution which the correct management of incontinence, and the provision of appropriate services, can make to enable those suffering from this distressing condition to obtain help and remain in their own homes in the community.

A considerable amount of research, much of it funded by the DHSS and the Welsh Office, has been carried out into various aspects of incontinence. For example, the results of a study of incontinence pads and garments was published in October 1986 by the DHSS and Welsh Office in the health equipment information series. In order to bring together the wide range or recently completed work, the Government are funding a research review by the nursing practice research unit at Surrey university.

Welsh Quality Lamb Ltd.

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to help farmers who suffered financial losses when Welsh Quality Lamb Ltd. went into liquidation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: No. Sales of livestock to Welsh Quality Lamb Ltd. were a matter of private commercial contract.

DEFENCE

Potton Island, Essex

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Defence what military nuclear research has been carried out at Potton Island, Essex.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None.

Amphibious Capability

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence, further to his answer of 9 December, Official Report, column 178, about the amphibious capability study (i) when he expects to complete the study of providing helicopter lift, including the concept of an aviation support ship, (ii) what criteria are to be involved; and (iii) what basic requirements as to the: (a) number of ships, (b) number of helicopters per ship, (c) number of marines to be carried per ship and (d) degree of protection to be provided he has laid down.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We shall be addressing the means of providing helicopter lift in support of amphibious operations over the next few months. The number of ships will be addressed within our consideration of the overall shape of the amphibious package. Details of the criteria involved are confidential.

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence, further to his answer of 9 December, Official Report, column 178, about amphibious capability (i) when he expects Swan Hunter to complete the feasibility study into extending the life of HMS Fearless and HMS Intrepid, (ii) when he expects to complete feasibility studies for a new design option for their replacement and (iii) which companies will be invited to do this work.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I would expect Swan Hunters to complete the feasibility study into extending the lives of HMS Fearless and Intrepid next summer. As for feasibility studies into the option of building new ships, letters have now been sent to some 80 firms asking whether they wish to participate in this work. On current plans I would expect these studies to be completed in the summer of 1988, with evaluation taking about a further year.

Meteorological Office (Services)

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, in simplified form, the scale of charges from the Meteorological Office for aviation services.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The CAA determines what services the Meteorological Office should provide to civil aviation, in fulfilment of international and domestic agreements. The charges for these services are made to the CAA at full cost, that is they include both the direct cost and a share of the core overhead cost.

Air operators and others in civil aviation who require meteorological information over and above that supplied by agreement with the CAA are charged on a repayment basis that is similar to that applying for other commercial users of the services of the Office.

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, in simplified form, the scale of charges from the Meteorological Office for marine services.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There is no scale of Meteorological Office charges for marine services.

In fulfilment of the United Kingdom's obligations as a signatory of the safety of life at sea agreement under the auspices of the International Maritime Organisation, no charge is made for the weather bulletins for shipping or for the sea area gale warnings as broadcast by the BBC and by coastal radio stations.

Other marine services, including for example those for the routeing of individual ships, for towing, for transfer of cargo at sea and for offshore oil and gas drilling rigs and production platforms, are provided on repayment. The charges are assessed on a case-by-case basis to cover direct costs plus a share of the costs of the core overheads.

The Meteorological Office has very recently arranged to provide a premium rated telephone forecast service for inshore mariners, including yachtsmen. This is known as Marinecall.

Nuclear Missiles

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence what decisions have been taken by Her Majesty's Government during the past three months involving contracts with British Aerospace for the development of a facility for the airborne launching of nuclear missiles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None.

Nimrod

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he made before reaching his decision to cancel the Nimrod project as to whether Boeing or GEC was the more likely to resolve first the vital question of secure data links for the airborne early warning system.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Boeing offered to deliver its first aircraft complete with JTIDS/Link 16 before GAv. We considered the risk associated with both proposals to be of the same order on this particular area.

Plessey

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will hold discussions with Plessey about the eventual control of the high technology development as a result of its £1,000 million agreement with Boeing; and whether it will pass to American control.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I shall answer shortly.

Army Officers (Education)

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out for each of the last 10 years the percentage of officers who have attended in their main schools (a) independent boarding, (b) grammar schools and (c) other schools, for each of (i) the Household Brigade, (ii) the Royal Armoured Corps excluding the Royal Tank Regiment and (iii) the Army as a whole.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is not held in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

AIDS and Venereal Disease

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what orders or advice have been issued to members of each of the armed forces about the dangers of AIDS; and when they were issued;

(2) over what period the 1st Battalion Queen's Own Highlanders was stationed in Kenya;

(3) when his Department and the Royal Army Medical Corps, respectively, became aware that the AIDS virus was common in parts of Kenya;

(4) when his Department and the Royal Army Medical Corps, respectively, first became aware the AIDS virus could be transmitted by heterosexual relations;

(5) what orders or advice on the risk of AIDS from prostitutes in Kenya were given to officers and other ranks of the 1st Battalion Queen's Own Highlanders;

(6) how many of all ranks of the 1st Battalion Queen's Own Highlanders are known to the Royal Army Medical Corps to have venereal disease caught in Kenya.

Mr. Freeman: I shall reply shortly.

Nimrod

Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost at 1986 prices of the Nimrod aircraft currently in service with the armed services (a) when they were first commissioned and (b) at the present day, including the costs of any updating or improvements.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 17 December 1986, c. 597]: I assume that my hon. Friend is referring to the Nimrod Maritime Reconnaissance (MR) Mk2 aircraft. These were converted from the Nimrod MR Mk1 aircraft, the original cost of which is not readily available and could not be provided except at disproportionate expense.

ENERGY

Miners (Redundancy Pay)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many miners have taken redundancy pay (a) during the miners strike and (b) since the strike ended; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: During the 1984-85 financial year, the year of the miners' strike, approximately 8,000 men left the industry under the redundant mineworkers payments scheme. From the end of that financial year to the end of December 1986 a further 56,000 qualified under the scheme. The reduction in manpower has enabled British Coal to make impressive gains in productivity.

SCOTLAND

Industrial Assistance

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing (a) the level of uptake of selective assistance to industry under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982 in cash terms for Scotland in each year since 1982 and (b) the percentage change in level of uptake between years.

Mr. Rifkind: Offers of regional selective assistance accepted by businesses in Scotland in each year since 1982 and the associated percentage changes between these values are given in the table.

	Value of offers accepted £ million	Percentage change between years
1982-83	52·2	—
1983-84	39·6	−24
1984-85	58·5	+48
1985-86	60·5	+3

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many assisted place scheme pupils in Ayrshire currently receive free school meals; and what has been the corresponding total for each year since the scheme began;

(2) which schools in Ayrshire are currently participating in the assisted places scheme; how much each is receiving towards the cost of the scheme in the current year; and what has been the total amount spent on the scheme in Ayrshire since it was introduced;

(3) what is the total number of pupils currently receiving an assisted place in schools in Ayrshire; what percentage of the total school roll at such schools they comprise; and how many of them are already attending a fee-paying school;

(4) if he will list the amount spent on (a) travel grants and (b) clothing grants to pupils on assisted places schemes in Ayrshire schools since the scheme was introduced.

Mr. John MacKay: Wellington school, Ayr, is the only school in Ayrshire to have participated in the assisted places scheme. The school was admitted to the scheme in school session 1982-83 and currently has 39 assisted pupils, 12 of whom attended a fee-paying school before taking up an assisted place. Assisted pupils form 7·7 per cent. of the current school roll. The additional information is as follows:

School year	Expenditure (£)	Number of assisted pupils	Number of assisted pupils receiving free school meals	Expenditure on travel grants (£)	Expenditure on clothing grants (£)
1982-83	2,742	3	Nil	251	54

Chapelcross (Radioactivity)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the critical groups of members of the public in the vicinity of Chapelcross for (a) direct emissions of radioactivity, (b) gaseous discharges of radioactive waste and (c) liquid discharges of radioactive waste; what are the pathways of exposure in each case; whether an individual may be a member of more than one critical group; what scientific method is adopted for individuals being members of more than one critical group; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The Scottish Development Department statistical bulletin No. 4/1984 tabulates the actual exposure pathways to the associated critical groups in respect of radioactive waste disposal for Chapelcross and describes the procedure followed when the same people are known to be members of more than one critical group.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what fraction or percentage of what recognised dose limit for members of the public was used as a target level for maximum exposure of members of the public in issuing new certificates of authorisation for radioactive discharges from British Nuclear Fuels Ltd, Chaplecross in April; whether this target level was applied to calculations of exposure arising only from operations at Chaplecross; whether this target level was applied to calculations of exposure arising from all sources of radiation other than naural and medical; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The certificates of authorisation issued in respect of Chapelcross works are consistent with the Government's objectives for radioactive waste management as set out in the White Paper (Cmnd. 9852), "Radioactive Waste: The Government's response to the Environment Committee's Report", and take into account exposure from all sources, excluding natural and medical.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley on 9 December, Official Report, column 134, concerning radiation exposure of the public arising from operations at Chapelcross, what proportion of radiation doses received by members of critical groups in the vicinity of Chapelcross arises from other discharges; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The levels of artificial radioactivity detectable in the inner Solway, which are low, result in part from the distant effects of Sellafield. Estimates of the contribution of this component to the doses to the critical group identified in respect of Chapelcross discharges are given in the aquatic environment monitoring reports of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, which are available in the Library.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley on 9 December, Official Report, column 134, if he will publish a table similar to the table on page 2 of the Scottish Development Department's "Statistical Bulletin No. 4, 1984" showing a summary of pathways of public radiation exposure in the vicinity of British Nuclear Fuels Ltd, Chapelcross in each year from 1981 to 1985 and showing the effective dose equivalent for each year in millisieverts.

Mr. Ancram: A statistical bulletin containing information in similar form to that of bulletin No. 4/1984 will be published shortly.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley on 9 December, Official Report, column 134, on the most recent assessment of annual dose levels, when the habits survey used in calculating such exposures was last revised; when the physiological uptake factors used in calculating such exposures were last revised; whether calculations of maximum exposures of members of the public in the vicinity of British Nuclear Fuels Ltd, Chapelcross in each year 1981 to 1995 inclusive have been revised to take account of the latest habit survey and uptake factors now available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The last formal habits survey was undertaken in 1982, but all factors relevant to the estimation of public radiation exposure from controlled disposal of radioactive waste are kept under review and assessments are revised in the light of the latest information available.

Fishing Industry

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will arrange to meet the leaders of the Scottish fishing industry to discuss in detail the recently announced total allowable catches for 1987 and their implication for the industry.

Mr. John MacKay: I met industry representatives before I attended the meeting of the Council of Fisheries Ministers on 17 and 18 December 1986, at which the 1987 total allowable catches were agreed, during a convenient break in the course of the Council meeting and also immediately after that meeting. I am satisfied that the agreed total allowable catches strike the correct balance between the current needs of the industry and the protection of fish stocks for future years.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will arrange, as a matter of urgency, to meet the leaders of the fish processing industry in Scotland to discuss the impact on the economic future of that industry of the recently announced total allowable catches for 1987.

Mr. John MacKay: I discussed this issue with representatives of the fish processing industry when I attended the annual dinner of the Scottish Fish Merchants' Federation on 12 December 1986. My officials also met representatives of the industry earlier that month.

I am well aware of the fish processors' concern about the reduced white fish quotas in 1987. It is, however, in the industry's long-term interests that steps should be taken now to conserve important fish stocks.

Incontinence

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what intiatives his Department takes in advising medical schools to provide training for medical practitioners in the care of the incontinent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: None. The undergraduate curriculum in medical schools is a matter for the universities to determine taking account of guidance issued from time to time by the General Medical Council.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) to what extent he encourages the provision of district continence nurse advisers; what encouragement he gives for the development of such services; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will take steps to ensure that minimum acceptable standards of care for incontinent persons are available within each district health authority in Scotland; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what advice his Department gives to health authorities regarding the importance of medical-surgical management and nursing-care management of incontinent patients; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what advice he gives regarding the provision of continence advice and service; what information he has on variations in care of incontinent patients from one area to another; if he will write to each health authority concerning provision for the treatment of incontinence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Guidance was issued in 1976 and 1977 to health boards and local authorities on the provision of aids and facilities for incontinent people. The results of a research study of incontinence pads and garments were sent to health boards in October 1986. It is for health boards to determine the level of service provision in the light of local needs and circumstances and information on an area basis about the incidence of incontinence and service provision is not held centrally. The term "continence adviser" is not generally used in Scotland but advice to individuals is given by general practitioners, district nurses, health visitors and social workers. Nurses with specialised expertise hold continence clinics and organise training programmes.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if his Department will provide vocational courses on the control and care of incontinent persons for general practitioners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Postgraduate education, including vocational training for general practitioners, is funded by the Department and provided through regional post-graduate committees and the postgraduate deans and regional advisers in general practice who are also responsible for determining the subject matter of the training courses offered. I understand that at least two courses dealing specifically with incontinence have been arranged for 1987. The topic will invariably be covered in other courses dealing with care of the elderly, terminally ill and neurological diseases.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice, encouragement and guidance his Department gives for the establishment of walk-in or self-referral continence clinics; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The establishment of such clinics is a matter for each health board to determine on the basis of its knowledge of the needs and priorities of its own area.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give an estimate of the number of male incontinent persons in the age brackets 15 to 64 and 65 plus years in Scotland; if he will give the same estimates for females; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The information requested is not available centrally.

Archaeological Officers

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will issue guidance to local authorities advising them of the need to appoint archaeological officers if they have not already done so.

Mr. Ancram: It is entirely for authorities to decide in the light of their local circumstances whether or not they need to employ archaeologists.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Supplementary Benefit

11. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many working people presently claim supplementary benefit; and what is the comparable figure for January 1980.

Mr. Lyell: Supplementary benefit is not payable to those in full-time work. The relevant benefit in the case of families with children is family income supplement. The number of families receiving family income supplement has increased from 82,000 in January 1980 to 210,000 in September 1986.

48. Mr. Harris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he intends to raise the £3,000 capital limit for supplementary benefit.

Mr. Major: Not in the short term. However, we have announced proposals for more generous treatment of capital in the income support scheme which is to replace supplementary benefit from April 1988. We propose that the capital limit will be doubled to £6,000, but a weekly income of £1 will be assumed for bands of capital of £250 between £3,000 and £6,000.

Doctors (NHS Appointments)

12. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which member of the National Health Service management board is responsible for ensuring that sufficient numbers and grades of doctors are available for appointment to National Health Service posts.

Mr. Newton: Overall responsibility rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services whose advisers include the National Health Service mangement board, which I chair.

AIDS

13. Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of acquired immune deficiency syndrome have been diagnosed to date; and how many deaths have resulted from the disease.

Mr. Fowler: The figure at the end of December 1986 was 610, of whom 293 have died.

19. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action his Department is taking to train counsellors for AIDS victims; and what numbers of counsellors are estimated to be needed by 1994.

Mr. Newton: We have provided funding for programmes of training in counselling at three centres—in London, Birmingham and Bolton. More than 2,350 people have been on courses provided by the London and Bolton units. It is not at present possible to estimate the number of counsellors who will be needed in 1994.

34. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of the impact amongst the general public of the Government's recent publicity campaign on the dangers of AIDS.

Mr. Newton: There is a continuing programme of research to monitor the effectiveness of the acquired immune deficiency syndrome publicity campaign and a full assessment will be made when detailed results are available. An initial evaluation of the newspaper advertising in November showed an encouraging response; the advertisements put across the main messages well and 69 per cent. of adults interviewed claimed to have seen at least one advertisement, an unusually high level of recall.

37. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will now approve a scheme for the supply of clean needles for drug addicts to prevent the further spread of the AIDS virus.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) on 18 December 1986 at column 703.

50. Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the programme of research into the causes of and cures for AIDS being sponsored by his Department.

Mr. Newton: Last year we had nine parliamentary questions and six letters from hon. Members about research relating to acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

East Birmingham Hospital

15. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the resources allocated to the East Birmingham hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The Department has received a number of representations about East Birmingham's financial problems. The allocation of resources to district health authorities is, however, a matter for regional health authorities which are best placed to make the necessary judgments. This year (1986-87) the West Midlands health region is getting a cash increase of 8·5 per cent., taking its annual revenue allocation to over £1 billion. As I have explained, it is for the West Midlands regional health authority to decide how best to divide this growth money between its 22 districts.

Abortions

16. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received regarding the criterion for allowing late abortions by the National Health Service.

Mr. Newton: We have received one letter and responded to five Parliamentary questions about the guidance given to regional health authorities.

Hospital and Community Health Services

17. Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the additional cost in 1987-88 of paying in full the pay awards agreed in the current year for hospital and community health services staff in England and Wales.

Mr. Newton: The additional cost in 1987-88 to health authorities in England of the pay awards made to review body staff in 1986 will be some £94 million. This, together with the cost of pay increases for other staff will be met from the total resources available to authorities which will include an additional £626 million — a 6 per cent. increase over 1986-87 — and the benefits of their cost improvement programmes.

The information relating to Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Board and Lodging Regulations

20. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he plans to make any changes to the board and lodgings regulations in the light of the special supplement on changes in board and lodging regulations issued recently by the board and lodging information programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: No. Some of the advice in the supplement is inaccurate. The chief adjudication officer has advised adjudication officers to disregard it.

Severe Weather Payments

21. Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the operation of the revised system of exceptionally severe weather payments.

39. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what further information he has received about the operation of the severe weather payments scheme.

Mr. Major: The arrangement with the Meteorological Office is for information on temperatures recorded at designated weather stations over a fixed seven-day period to be received by the Department on the following Tuesday. One weather station, Eskdalemuir, recorded an average weekly temperature below minus 1·5 deg. C. in the week ending 11 January, and arrangements are in hand to publicise the availability of these payments in the area which is covered by the Galashiels local office.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what plans he has to publicise the new severe weather payments; on what date the new leaflet will be published; and where the new leaflet will be placed for public information;

(2) if he will give (a) the minimum night temperature, (b) the daily mean temperature and (c) the weekly mean temperature for each of the weather stations used for calculating severe weather payments for the week 5 January to 11 January inclusive;

(3) if he will give a list of the weather stations not included in the list of those used for calculating severe weather payments, indicating which of them had (a) minimum night temperatures of −1·5 deg C or below on any night, (b) daily mean temperatures of −1·5 deg C or below and (c) weekly mean temperatures of −1·5 deg C or below for the week 5 January to 11 January inclusive.

Mr. John Major: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Councillors (Attendance Allowances)

22. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received regarding the effect of councillors' attendance allowances on social security benefits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lyell: Last year we had 33 letters on the subject. Early in the year my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State received representations from the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) about this issue. More recently, my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security received three deputations, led by the right hon. Member for Ashton under Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Mr. Durant) and the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) involving other hon. Members and representatives from councillors' organisations. We are considering the points they made.

Merseyside

23. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the latest waiting lists for the Mersey regional health authority and the Liverpool teaching health authority.

Mr. Newton: The latest figures show that, while the total on the list is significantly below previous years and has remained stable over the last year, Mersey regional health authority has already made substantial progress in reducing the proportion of patients who have to wait excessively for treatment. For Liverpool district health authority, for example, the proportion on the waiting list for over a year is under two thirds of the national average. Both the region and Liverpool district have ambitious plans in hand to make further progress.

Supplementary Benefit Office (The Oval)

24. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the reopening of the Oval SE5 supplementary benefit office.

Mr. Lyell: The Department regrets that its Oval office was unable to open to the public between 22 October 1986 and 21 November 1986.

On 22 October 1986 an attack by a claimant caused damage to furniture and fittings in the public reception area and the office had to be closed from that date to enable repairs to be made. The damage was made good by 13 November 1986 but the office could not be reopened because some members of staff were taking industrial action.

The industrial action ceased on 24 November 1986 and the office reopened to the public on that day.

Save a Life Campaign

25. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the public response to the Save a Life Campaign in relation to immediate care.

Mrs. Currie: The Save a Life Campaign was initiated by the Royal Society of Medicine and is intended to promulgate simple life-saving techniques among the general public.

We have been very pleased with the public response to this campaign. I understand that the average audience for the BBC television programmes was 7 million: by Christmas, nearly 70,000 inquiries had been received by the campaign office, and over 17,000 people were known to have attended classes. I have myself attended a Save a Life class in London and I was very impressed by the clarity of instruction and the enthusiasm shown. The BBC will also broadcast a follow-up programme to the campaign and will be repeating the series later in the year.

I would like to congratulate all concerned, but especially the volunteer staff, the BBC, and the British Heart Foundation, who made a substantial contribution.

Social Security Budget

26. Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest assessment of the net effect on the 1987-88 social security budget of the changes made in the social security review.

Mr. Major: The net effect on public expenditure on social security of the reform measures which will have been introduced by the end of 1987-88 is estimated to be a reduction in that year of about £220 million.

Invalid Care Allowance

27. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the restricted time period during which married women could apply for invalid care allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: There is no deadline for applications from married women to receive invalid care allowance from current date, plus up to 12 months arrears subject to qualifying conditions being met. A deadline of 31 December 1986 was, however, fixed for claims attracting arrears back to 22 December 1984, the date of implementation of the European Community's equal treatment directive. To ensure that as many people as possible were aware of this, we arranged an extensive publicity campaign and we have written to 400,000 attendance allowance clamants who are paid by computer. So far 90,000 married women have claimed ICA, but claims are still coming in at the rate of 2,000 a week.

Representations about the deadline for claiming full arrears have been received from the Child Poverty Action Group, the Vice President of the European Parliament, the noble Lord, Lord Ennals, the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley), my hon. Friends the Members for Leicester, East (Mr. Brunivels) and for Newark (Mr. Alexander), the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) and the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook). When the decision to extend ICA to married women was announced last summer, we thought that six months would be sufficient time for these back-dated claims, and set the deadline accordingly. However, in view of the representations made, and the rate at which claims are still being received, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 22 December that the deadline was being extended to 31 August 1987. We will also be writing to other attendance allowance beneficiaries who are paid by local offices over the next few months when their order books are renewed.

35. Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many married women have applied for invalid care allowance in the last few months.

Mr. Major: In the period between 23 June 1986, when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced the intention to extend invalid care allowance to married women, and 19 December 1986, the latest date for which figures are available, 77,000 claims have been received from married women.

Cervical Cancer Screening

28. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if any additional resources are to be provided to local health authorities to implement fully computerised call and recall systems for cervical cancer screening; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: No additional resources are to be provided, and we are satisfied that, at the present time, none are called for. Improvements to cervical cancer screening programmes have been made a service development priority for all health authorities, and as a result all authorities plan to have computerised call and recall screening systems in place by April 1988.

Residential Care

29. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will review the current regulations concerning the licensing and registration of residential care homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) on 19 November 1986 at column 217.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the control of standards of care provided in board and lodging houses, private nursing homes and residential care houses.

Mrs. Currie: Nursing homes must be registered by district health authorities under part II of the Registered Homes Act 1984 and residential care homes by local social services authorities under part I of the Act. The services and facilities to be provided in these homes are specified respectively in the Nursing Homes and Mental Nursing Homes Regulations 1984 and the Residential Care Homes Regulations 1984, as amended. The Department has issued general guidance to both types of registration authorities and has commended to health authorities a handbook produced by the National Association of Health Authorities and to local authorities the code of practice for residential care, "Home Life".

Health authorities are obliged to inspect nursing homes at least twice a year and local authorities to inspect residential care homes at least once a year. Authorities are encouraged to inspect more frequently, if necessary. Inspections may be at any time of the day or night, and without notice.

For information about a study of the effects of the new registration arrangements for residential care homes I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) on 19 November 1986, at column 217. Local authorities have powers under the Housing Acts to monitor houses in multiple occupation and this control is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Sick Pay

30. Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people will lose from the abolition of the middle rate of statutory sick pay.

Mr. Lyell: It is estimated that in a full year some 400,000 spells of statutory sick pay are payable at the middle rate. But many employees will be covered by their employers' occupational sick pay scheme and will not therefore suffer any loss in income.

Hospital Building Programme

31. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his Department's estimate of the number of hospital beds within the present hospital building programme.

51. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the capital building programme in the National Health Service.

Mrs. Currie: The current National Health Service building programme in England comprises over 400 schemes, each costing over £1 million, at various stages of planning, design and construction. Of these, about 110 schemes are planned for completion over the next three years. The total cost of the programme, including fees and equipment, is about £3 billion and it will provide over 21,500 new hospital beds.

The programme includes new hospitals which will meet health care needs in new towns and other centres of expanding population such as Milton Keynes, Telford and Bournemouth. At St. Mary's Paddington and Manchester royal infirmary new facilities will replace obsolete and inefficient buildings dating back to the last century. Other smaller schemes will provide accommodation in the community for the elderly, mentally ill and handicapped patients to enable them to be cared for near their homes and families.

The modern hospitals coming into operation are more economical to run than those they replace. Close attention to planning procedures and the use of the nucleus standard design, developed by the Department, have largely eliminated the escalating costs and late completions which held up the building programme in the past.

Single Payments (Insulation)

32. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he intends to retain single payments as of right for insulation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: Under regulation 18 of the Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) Regulations 1981, supplementary benefit claimants may receive a lump sum payment of benefit to meet the cost of materials to carry out simple draught-proofing measures in their homes.

We are considering future arrangements for help with draught-proofing with the other Government Departments concerned, in the context of the overall help available to people on low incomes with energy conservation measures.

Diabetics

33. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what further single consideration has been given to the possibility of making disposable syringes and blood glucose monitoring strips available on general practitioner prescription to diabetics.

Mrs. Currie: We are keeping the position under review.

Personal Social Services

36. Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in the light of the commitment given by the Government in its response to recommendation 18 in the Social Services Committee's report on "Public Expenditure on the Social Services", H.C. Paper 387, he will indicate his precise plans for obtaining the information requested about the provision of personal social services; and, in particular, which social services departments will be selected for assessment of the consequences of inadequate personal social services spending growth.

Mr. Newton: The Government's response to this recommendation promised to see what information could be provided. We made it clear that analysis of changes in spending levels does not necessarily give an indication of the adequacy of current spending. There are many factors to be taken into account. We are undertaking work on financial, population and activity data available to the Department to see if any useful results can be obtained. This work is not yet completed. It is too early to assess the results or to indicate which individual social services departments might need further scrutiny.

Basingstoke and District Hospital

38. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what trend there has been in waiting lists for treatment at the Basingstoke and District hospital since 1983.

Mr. Newton: Information is given in the table. This suggests that the disappointing upward trend at Basingstoke district general hospital is beginning to decline. For the district health authority as a whole lists rose much more slowly, increasing by 2·2 per cent. between March 1983 and March 1986. Nevertheless, this underlines the need for the drive to reduce excessive waiting lists and times which is being undertaken, supported by a special fund of £50 million over the two years 1987-88 and 1988-89. Basingstoke district health authority and Wessex regional health authority are already implementing ambitious plans to make improvements.

Patients on in-patient waiting list at 31 December

	1983	1984	1985	Change 1983-1985
	Number	Number	Number	Number	Percentage
Basingstoke and District (General Division)	2,142	2,445	2,724	582	+27·2

Mobility Allowance

40. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any plans to review the existing regulations relating to mobility allowance.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on 25 November 1986 at column 288.

Doctors (Over-prescribing)

41. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action is taken against doctors who habitually over-prescribe drugs.

Mr. Newton: Subject to the requirements of the selected list scheme a general medical practitioner is required by his terms of service to prescribe whatever drugs he considers necessary for the treatment of his patients. Nevertheless, general medical practitioners whose prescribing costs are more than 25 per cent. above the average of colleagues in their area may be visited by doctors of the Department's regional medical service. Advice is given on how to modify prescribing habits without detriment to patient care.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department has powers under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 to deal with cases of irresponsible prescribing of controlled drugs.

Incontinence

42. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many incontinence pads were supplied to the National Health Service in each of the past 10 years; at what cost; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: This information is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. It is for the local health authorities to decide policy on the provision of incontinence pads and other incontinence aids.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what initiatives his Department takes in advising medical schools to provide training for medical practitioners in the care of the incontinent; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if his Department will provide vocational courses on the control and care of incontinent persons for general practitioners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Under the helping the community to care programme, the Department is funding a project for the development, by the King's Fund, of an information and training pack for general practitioners, community nurses and other professional staff, on the management of incontinence in elderly people. The training materials, consisting of handbooks, videos and a pocket book, are to be launched in May 1987.

The content of undergraduate medical education is a matter for universities, within broad guidelines laid down by the General Medical Council. Continuing education and vocational training for general practitioners in England is centrally funded by the Department, at the rate of nearly £2·5 million this year. The allocations are administered regionally by general practice educational sub-committees, who determine the content and nature of the educational activities. The Department intends to publicise the King's Fund training materials both to universities with medical schools and to the general practice educational sub-committees.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) to what extent he encourages the provision of district continence nurse advisers; what encouragement he gives for the development of such services; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what advice, encouragement and guidance his Department gives for the establishment of walk-in or self-referral continence clinics; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will take steps to ensure that minimum acceptable standards of care for incontinent persons are available within each health board in England; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: It is for individual authorities to decide for themselves both the level of provision, and the pace and direction of further developments in their services, in the light of their local needs and circumstances.

We do, however, expect health authorities to provide appropriate services for incontinent people, and in 1977 the Department's chief nursing officer wrote to all health authorities advising them that the management of incontinence should be clearly identified as the responsibility of a designated special nurse, who should act as a "resource person" for nurses working in hospitals and the community services. Since then, most district health authorities have appointed at least one continence adviser. Community nurses also provide advice and assessment as part of their nursing duties.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what advice his Department gives to health authorities regarding the importance of medical-surgical management and nursing-care management of incontinent patients; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what advice he gives regarding the provision of continence advice and service; what information he has on variations in care of incontinent patients from one area to another; if he will write to each health authority concerning provision for the treatment of incontinence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Although data about incontinence services in particular districts are not routinely collected, information about these services is regularly included in the reports of the Health Advisory Service, and is also obtained informally by the Department's own officers.

There has been a growing awareness in recent years of the important contribution which the correct management of incontinence, and the provision of appropriate services, can make to enable those suffering from this distressing condition to obtain help and to remain in their own homes in the community.

A considerable amount of research, much of it funded by the Government, has been carried out into various aspects of incontinence. For example, the results of a study of incontinence pads and garments was published in October 1986 by the DHSS, Scottish Home and Health Department, Welsh Office and Department of Health and Social Services (Northern Ireland) in the "Health Equipment Information" series. In order to bring together the wide range of recently completed work, we are funding a research review by the Nursing Practice Research Unit at Surrey university. In order to disseminate the research results and to present options for the development of cost-effective services, we are to hold a seminar in February 1987 for service managers from health authorities and social services departments.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is his estimate of the number of incontinence sufferers in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will give an estimate of the number of male incontinent persons in the age bracket 15 to 64 and 65-plus years in England; if he will give the same estimates for females; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: An epidemiological survey conducted by the Medical Research Council's epidemiology and medical care unit between 1976 and 1979 covering a sample of the general population in England and Wales showed rates of prevalence of urinary incontinence per thousand of population as follows:

	Rate per thousand population
Males
aged 15-64	16
aged 65 and over	69
Females
aged 15-64	85
aged 65 and over	116

Using the 1980 population figures, this would give a total prevalence of adult incontinence in the community of the order of approximately 2½ million in the United Kingdom.

Radiotherapy

43. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what factors he takes into account in determining whether regional health authorities should be permitted to proceed with reorganisation of radiotherapy services into large regional centres; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The organisation of radiotherapy services in individual regions is a matter for regional health authorities. If, following public consultation, we are required to examine any specific proposal to which a community health council has objected, all relevant factors are taken into account including the results of that consultation.

Guidance to health authorities on the provision of radiotherapy services is set out in HC(78)32 and was confirmed in HN(84)23, which covered a report on acute services for cancer by an expert working group of the standing sub-committee on cancer of the Department's standing medical advisory committee, copies of which are in the Library.

Hospital Waiting Lists

44. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from general practitioners about the effect of the present length of waiting lists on their willingness to refer patients for hospital treatment.

Mr. Newton: We can trace no recent representations from general practitioners or their representatives on this specific point.

Housing Benefit

45. Mr. Raynsford asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the progress in discussions between his Department and the local authority associations on the detailed arrangements for the housing benefit scheme changes effective from April 1988.

Mr. Lyell: Discussions with the local authority associations on the detailed structure of the new housing benefit scheme are nearing completion. Draft regulations have been issued for formal consultation.

Discussions on future subsidy arrangements are also in progress with the aim of reaching decisions on the basic framework as quickly as possible.

Mr. Raynsford asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing the total number and percentage of home owners in Great Britain receiving rate rebates, including former supplementary benefit payments towards rates, in each of the years from 1979 to 1986, the total cost of such payments and the average payment per recipient.

Mr. Lyell [pursuant to his reply, 3 December 1986, c. 693-94]: Information relating to rate rebate expenditure on home owners is not available. Similarly information relating to the number of home owners receiving rate rebates before 1983 is not available. Estimates of the number of home owners receiving rate rebates from 1983 are as follows:

Year	Average number of recipients (thousands)	Percentage of all home owners
1983-84	2,540	20
1984-85	2,540	20
1985-86	2,440	18
1986-87	2,410	18

Note: The percentage of all home owners for 1986-87 is calculated using information on 1985 properties.

Medical Equipment

46. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any plans to extend the range of medical equipment available under National Health Service prescription; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The approved list of appliances, dressings and chemical reagents which general medical practitioners may prescribe on the National Health Service is kept under constant review. Changes to the list are made in consultation with representatives of the medical and pharmaceutical professions, in the light of the changing needs of general practice, the extent of demand, availability and cost.

Nurse Education

47. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what will be the cost to the National Health Service of introducing the current proposal of the United Kingdom Central Council for the restructuring of nurse education.

Mr. Newton: The United Kingdom Central Council's project 2000 report—"A New Preparation for Practice"—was issued as a consultation document. The UKCC is now preparing definitive proposals in the light of consultation and until these are published any estimate of cost could only be speculative.

Cancer Treatment

49. Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will intervene in the review of cancer treatment facilities in the Thames health regions.

Mrs. Currie: The development of cancer treatment services is the responsibility primarily of the relevant regional and district health authorities, and special health authorities. Proposals to change existing patterns of services are usually referred to Ministers only if they are opposed by the local community health council.

Benefits

52. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will state the number of persons receiving supplementary or housing benefit and the number of such beneficiaries six years earlier.

Mr. Lyell: The information is as follows:

	Numbers of recipients (thousands)
Supplementary Benefit
December 1985	4,587
November 1979	2,855
Housing Benefit
Autumn 1985	[1]7,150
Autumn 1979 (England and Wales)	[2]2,684
April 1979 (Scotland)	[2]374

[1] Of these, 3,310,000 were also in receipt of supplementary benefit.
[2] Relates to the rate rebate scheme which preceded the present housing benefit scheme. The figures do not include supplementary benefit claimants receiving help with their rent and rates under that scheme.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people in the London borough of Newham have been in receipt of (a) supplementary benefit and (b) housing benefit in each year since 1979.

Mr. Lyell: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Buildings (Solar Techniques and Technology)

53. Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what design guidance and requirements his Department is issuing to health authorities and others for new hospital and other health buildings and renovation work to encourage them to use passive solar techniques and technology.

Mrs. Currie: Advice on the orientation of health buildings and optimising window areas is included in energy efficiency guidance issued to health authorities. The Department is also monitoring research on solar technology, including the use of atria and conservatories.

Cervical Smears

54. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he intends to take to initiate methods of controlling the qualifications of staff engaged in private laboratories processing cervical smears and their standards of quality control.

Mrs. Currie: We would expect health authorities which use private laboratories to have due regard for the qualifications of staff employed and for standards of quality control. In addition to existing arrangements, discussions are taking place with relevant United Kingdom professional bodies on the introduction of voluntary external quality assurance schemes and on improvements to training and certification for non-medical laboratory staff. These would be relevant to all laboratories in which cervical smears are examined. Arrangements in Scotland are, of course, a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Pre-school Play Groups

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number and proportion of 3 to 4-year-olds going to pre-school play groups in the voluntary sector for each of the last five years.

Mrs. Currie: Statistics are not collected centrally in the form requested, but a rough estimate based on figures supplied by the Pre-School Playgroups Association would be that half the 3 to 4-year-olds attend. The table lists the number of playgroup places provided in England by the voluntary and private sectors taken together and the numbers of places per thousand population aged under five.

Year	Places[1] (in thousands)	Places per thousand population aged under five[2]
1982	364·8	131
1983	371·6	133
1984	384·9	133
1985	391·1	138
[3]1986	406·6	138

[1] The numbers of places are as at 31 March.
[2] The numbers of places per thousand population aged under five are based on the population as at 30 June of the previous year.
[3] The 1986 figures are provisional.

The information relating to Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and Northern Ireland, and my right hon and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Transplant Organs

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on his discussions with Professor Michael Oliver on the possibility of amending the Human Tissue Act, so that hospital authorities can take the organs of those who have not opted out during their lifetime.

Mr. Newton: We are not aware of any such discussions having taken place.

Nurses' Welfare Service

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why he has refused financial help for the Nurses' Welfare Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The Nurses' Welfare Service is administered by a trust which is an autonomous voluntary body supported by charitable organisations, health authorities and the United Kingdom Central Council for Nursing, Midwifery, and Health Visiting. Power to provide grants from central funds is provided under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968, but grants under this provision are not normally paid to organisations providing services which are limited to the employees of a particular profession with a distinct employer.

Medical Personnel (Emigration)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will initiate an urgent review of the extent and effects of the continued and increasing emigration of the top medical personnel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Some movement of doctors between countries, for instance to pursue postgraduate training and research, is to be expected. The available evidence suggests that the net outflow of United Kingdom medical graduates is substantially less than it was in the 1960s and 1970s. The evidence will be examined by the Second Advisory Committee on Medical Manpower Planning, which my right hon. Friend, in consultation with the other United Kingdom Health Ministers, has established to consider likely developments in the supply of, and demand for, medical manpower in the United Kingdom. We will be considering the implications in the light of the committee's advice.

National Association of Young People in Care

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress has been made in reaching a decision on the application by the National Association of Young People in Care for financial assistance over the next three years.

Mrs. Currie: The additional information referred to in my reply to the hon. Member on 28 October 1986, at column 127, has now been received from the National Association of Young People in Care and is being considered. It is hoped that a decision on the association's application for grant-aid will be given soon.

Hearing Aids

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why there is a shortage of supplies in hearing aid centres of National Health Service aids in the BE30's range; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Influenza Vaccine

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the effect on the voluntary price regulation scheme of doctors who buy 'flu vaccine at a 20 per cent. discount which is not shown on the invoices to be reimbursed by his Department.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Severe Disability Premium

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if, pursuant to the reply to the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe on 18 December, Official Report, column 705, a person will be eligible for the severe disability premium if he uses that premium to meet the expenses of a volunteer living with him who is not under the auspices of a voluntary organisation;

(2) if, pursuant to the reply to the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe on 18 December, Official Report, Column 705, he will state what information he has on the range of charges currently being made by voluntary organisations providing volunteers to live with severely disabled people;

(3) if, pursuant to the reply to the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe on 18 December, Official Report, column 705, he will state what is the number of the estimated 7,000 recipients of the severe disability premium who will be in receipt of the higher rate of attendance allowance;

(4) if, pursuant to the reply to the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe on 18 December, Official Report, column 705, a person will be eligible for the severe disability premium if he uses that premium to pay for a person to live with him in order to provide the assistance he requires;

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) why he has decided to offer the severe disability premium only to disabled people who live alone and are in receipt of attendance allowance but who are not cared for by a person claiming invalid care allowance;

(2) on what basis it has been decided that disabled people who are cared for by someone in receipt of invalid care allowance should not qualify for the severe disability premium; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: I shall let the right hon. members have replies as soon as possible.

Leicestershire District Health Authority

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make a statement on the allocation of resources under the National Health Service to the Leicestershire district health authority.

Mr. Newton: Revenue expenditure in Leicestershire district health authority increased by 34 per cent. in real terms between 1978-79 and 1986-87, in part as a result of the continuing commitment to achieve a fairer distribution of National Health Service resources across the country. That process will continue. My right hon. Friend recently announced regional health authorities' resource allocations for 1987-88. I am pleased to confirm that the Trent regional health authority, of which Leicestershire is a part, will again receive a substantial increase in revenue resources, of 6·3 per cent. (over £55 million) in cash or 2·5 per cent. in real terms over 1986-87, bringing the total real terms increase since 1978-79 to 30 per cent. Allocation to districts are a matter for regional health authorities, but Leicestershire will undoubtedly benefit from the increased resources made available to Trent region.

Child Care Law

Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will now publish his proposals for the reform of child care law; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler: The welfare and protection of children is a matter of great concern to all of us, and it is important that the law reflects that concern. I am pleased to publish today our proposals for a major overhaul of child care law and also to propose measures to improve the safeguards where young children are being looked after by child minders or in other day-care facilities.

Our proposals take account of the recommendations of the working party on child care law and the many comments received on them as well as the views of those who commented on arrangements for children under five. They will offer a better service for families and protection of children at risk of harm.

The Government remain committed to introducing legislation as soon as parliamentary time can be found.

Pay Beds

Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he intends to introduce any changes to the system for setting pay bed charges; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Following extensive consultations, we have decided that the function of determining charges for private in-patients, private out-patients and amenity beds in National Health Service hospitals should be delegated to district and special health authorities. Regulations will be laid shortly to make this effective from 1 April 1987. Authorities will be able to choose whether to set their own charges, or to use rates produced centrally.

Those authorities which opt to set their own charges will be expected to do so to recover their costs, taking account of the recent recommendations of the Committee of Public Accounts decisions on the level of the centrally produced rates which will take account of these recommendations will be announced in due course.

Guardians Ad Litem

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether any local authorities have received extra funding to appoint guardians ad litem; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987]: Provision was made in the rate support grant settlement for 1984-85 based on expected costs discussed with representatives of the local authorities.

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, what information he has as to how long it takes guardians ad litem to be appointed after child care proceedings have been initiated; and how long it takes their reports to be provided to the courts.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987]: Comprehensive information is not held centrally. However, a recent informal exercise conducted by the Department suggests that in more than half the areas the time taken to appoint guardians ad litem is up to one week. In a few cases a period of more than eight weeks elapses. Guardians are usually expected to present their reports to the court within six to eight weeks.

American Medical Students

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has, and what discussions have taken place, concerning the admission of American students from Caribbean universities to study medicine in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987]: Medical students of overseas universities, the qualifications of which are recognised by the General Medical Council for purposes of registration in this country, may be granted facilities to do part of their clinical training in National Health Service hospitals. Health authorities are discouraged from providing access to clinical facilities for students of any medical schools not so recognised. Officials are considering with professional and academic interests the need for revised guidance on the conditions under which students may undertake clinical work in NHS hospitals.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list by region all hospitals whose future closure has been approved, the year when it is likely to take effect, and the number of beds that will be lost in each case; and if he will provide similar data regarding future cuts in beds in hospitals which are not being fully closed.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987]: The information we routinely collect centrally relates to the timing of approval for permanent total or partial closure, or change of use, following public consultation. It does not specify the date when the closure or change of use is planned to take effect, nor does it contain details of any reprovision of services. Health authorities' future plans for permanent closures or substantial changes of use must be subject to public consultation before they can be approved.

For the information we keep centrally, up to August 1986, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 24 November 1986, at columns 143-46.

Birth Statistics

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for the years 1982 to 1985 the estimated percentages of women delivering in (a) England and (b) England and Wales (i) whose labours were induced, (ii) whose labours were of spontaneous onset and (iii) who had elective caesarean sections.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 9 December 1986, c. 126]: The information is shown in the table. Data for 1985 are not yet available.

Estimated percentages of women delivering by type of onset of labour 1982-84

ENVIRONMENT

Fire Research Station

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the current staffing level of the Fire Research Station; and what were the numbers of staff in post on 1 June in each of the years 1984 to 1986 inclusive.

Mr. John Patten: There were 109 staff in post at the Fire Research Station on 1 December 1986. The numbers in post on 1 June 1984, 1985 and 1986 were 113½, 106 and 111 respectively.

Building Research

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the research or testing work carried out by (a) the Building Research Establishment and (b) The British Board of Agrément regarding cavity insulation, since the reply by the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) on 6 June 1984.

Mr. John Patten: The Building Research Establishment has continued its research programme into the effectiveness and performance of cavity fill insulation. The research has assisted the preparation and publication of British standards which ensure that the insulants are correctly installed so that maximum thermal benefit may be achieved with minimum danger of rain penetration or ingress of any substances likely to cause irritation to the occupants. A survey of reported incidents of rain penetration of insulated cavity walls mainly in new private housing has been carried out with the collaboration of BEC, BBA and the NHBC. The provisional findings are being discussed with those who collaborated in the study and other interested organisations with a view to publishing a report of the study. Work continues on the effectiveness of water repellant treatments to the external wall in preventing rain penetration on the effect of the width of the cavity on the risk of rain penetration of insulated walls.

The British Board of Agrément continues to test and assess products and systems for cavity wall insulation. 41 agrément certificates for these have been issued since June 1984 here are currently 40 certificates valid for built-in full and partial-fill products, and 37 for injected systems.

The board has collaborated with the BRE and others in the recent survey of rain penetration of insulated cavity walls.

The BBA's surveillance scheme, by which the board monitors the quality of work done by approved installers of injected systems, was improved and extended in 1985, notably to increase checks on companies' methods of management and control of products used.

Hamilton Development (Leicester)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he held with the House Builders Federation on the proposed Hamilton development, prior to his approval for a modified development at Hamilton, north-east Leicester.

Mr. Tracey: The House Builders Federation took part in the examination in public of the alteration to the Leicestershire structure plan when this proposal was extensively discussed.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy concerning the construction of large council housing estates and how this policy was applied to the proposed Hamilton plan in Leicester.

Mr. Tracey [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987]: My right hon. Friend is against large new rented estates. He sees councils primarily as enablers rather than producers of housing, with a special responsibility for groups like the homeless whose needs the private sector cannot meet in full. Housing policies and proposals in development plans relate to the number and location of new dwellings. It is not part of their function to indicate whether the provision will be made by the public or the private sector.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what criterion he used in assessing the need for a large scale housing development at Hamilton in the Leicester, East constituency, and on what basis he considered such a development as "environmentally desirable".

Mr. Tracey [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987]: Provision of land for housing in structure plans takes account of market demand and other housing requirements. The proposal for Hamilton is in accord with our policy that development should be directed towards urban locations and avoid increased pressure on environmentally sensistive small villages and rural areas.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received (a) in favour and (b) against the proposed new development at Hamilton, north-east Leicester.

Mr. Tracey [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987]: My right hon. Friend has received five representations in favour of the development and seven against it. Five other representations supported development in this location, but suggested that provision before 1996 should be reduced.

Mersey Barrage

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the present position in respect of the proposed Mersey barrage scheme.

Mr. John Patten: The Merseyside Barrage Company was formed in February 1986 to foster joint participation from the public and private sectors.

A £700,000 study is to take place to investigate that there are no overriding impediments to the construction of the barrage and its preferred location.

The barrage is primarily an energy-based project. The Department of Energy is in the lead for the Government and has contributed £400,000 towards the cost of the feasibility study.

Merseyside Development Corporation

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last had discussions with the chairman of the Merseyside Development Corporation; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. John Patten: I met Mr. Forster on 9 July 1986. The meeting was to discuss the corporation's progress in achieving the aims of its current corporate plan and to look forward to the preparation of the next.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the members of the Merseyside Development Corporation, stating their occupations, whether they are appointed in a full-time or part-time capacity and their remuneration in each case.

Mr. John Patten: The information held by the Department is as follows:

Mr. Donald Forster, Chairman
Retired chairman of the family textile company. Former Chairman of Warrington and Runcorn Development Corporation.

Mr. John Smith, CBE, Deputy Chairman
Director of private manufacturing company. Chairman of Sports Council and Chairman of Liverpool Football Club.

Professor Graham Ashworth, CBE
Professor of Urban Environmental Studies, Salford University.

Dr. Noel Boaden
Dean of the Faculty of Social and Environmental Studies, Liverpool University.

Mr. Phillip Carter, CBE
Chairman, Everton Football Club. President, The Football League. Chairman, Merseyside Tourism Board. Chairman Designate of the Croxteth Hall Trust. Former Managing Director of Littlewoods Organisation plc.

Councillor Thomas Glover
Councillor Sefton Borough Council. Insurance Consultant.

Councillor John Hale
Councillor Wirral Borough Council. Public Finance Accountant with the North West Water Authority.

Mr. John Leighton Boyce
Director of Pilkingtons, National Westminster Bank plc and County Banks Ltd.

Mr. Clive Lewis
Senior Partner of Clive Lewis and Partners, Surveyors. Member of the Executive Committee of FIABCA (International Real Estate Federation). Member of the 1987 International Year of Shelter for the Homeless Council.

Dr. John Ritchie
Chief Executive of the Corporation.

Members are required to notify the Department of changes in occupation only if there is a possiblity of conflict of interest; this therefore is not necessarily a complete description of members' occupations at the present time. Members are appointed in a part-time capacity. The chairman works two days per week, the deputy chairman one day per week and members half a day per week. The current salaries are £17,406, £5,907 and £3,465 per annum respectively.

Merseyside Residuary Body

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last held discussions with the chairman of the Merseyside residuary body; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend has not held any discussions with the chairman of the Merseyside residuary body, but my noble Friend met the chairman on 16 December at Croxteth hall for the purposes outlined in the answer given to the hon. Member on 16 December by my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave). I met Mr. Brodrick on 23 October at a meeting with the residuary body chairmen at which matters concerning the residuary bodies' functions in general were discussed. These included staff, property, finance and progress towards wind-up.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the members of the Merseyside residuary body, stating their occupations, whether they are appointed in a full or part-time capacity and their remuneration in each case.

Mr. Chope: The information is as follows:

Name	Occupation	Day per week	Remuneration £
Norman Brodrick (Chairman)	Ex-Local agent, Bank of England	2	18,198
Duncan Forbes	Ex-Managing Director, Booker Line	1	5,830
John Hill	Ex-Treasurer, Liverpool City Council	1	5,830
Bill Hughes	Ex-Director of Personnel and Management Services Wirral MBC	1	5,830
Leslie Jones	Ex-Superintending Estates Officer DOE	1	5,830
Kenneth Medlock	Vice Chairman, Merseyside Chamber of Commerce and Industry	1	5,830
Barrie Marsh	Solicitor, Chairman of Liverpool Chamber of Commerce	1	5,830
Philip Carter	Ex-Managing Director, Littlewoods Organisation, Chairman, Everton Football Club	1	5,830

Rivers (Pollution)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is taking to combat pollution in the river Soar.

Mr. Waldegrave: The responsibility for controlling pollution of the river Soar lies with the Severn Trent water authority. As I indicated in my reply to the hon. Member on 17 December 1986, at column 580, I am satisfied that the powers available to water authorities are generally adequate for dealing with pollution of rivers.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps have been taken to reduce pollution in British rivers since 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave: The main provisions of part II of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 have been progressively implemented since July 1984. The Act provides comprehensive controls over discharge to rivers.

Reema Houses

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the Building Research Establishment to complete the investigation into the Reema type of prefabricated reinforced concrete house.

Mr. John Patten: I shall answer this question shortly.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on his Department's public expenditure plans, following publication of the White Paper setting out the Government's expenditure plans 1987-88 to 1989-90.

Mr. Ridley: The White Paper amplifies my Department's plans for expenditure in 1987-88 to 1989-90, announced in summary at the time of the autumn statement. It also contains a wealth of information about what we have achieved through our programmes in past years, and about our targets for the future.

Housing: £450 million extra for 1987-88

Gross capital provision for housing for 1987-88 is £3,661 million. This is £451 million more than previously planned, and £225 million more than expected outturn for 1986-87. Resources for Estate Action (the urban housing renewal unit) have been increased by 50 per cent. to £75 million. This will enable the unit to build on its success in developing, in conjunction with local authorities, innovative approaches to dealing with the problems of rundown estates. In 1986-87 the unit is supporting over 100 schemes, involving more than 55,000 dwellings, in 40 different authorities. In 1987-88 Estate Action expects to support 150 schemes, invloving over 82,000 dwellings.

The Housing Corporation's approved development plan for 1987-88 is £705 million, a £20 million increase over its gross provision this year. This will allow the corporation to approve some 22,000 new housing association houses for rent and for sale—a 21 per cent. increase over 1986-87. The additional £20 million is provided specifically for new schemes mixing 30 per cent. HAG and private finance. Together with a further £10 million from within the programme, mixed finance schemes should generate £100 million of new housing investment by housing associations.

Urban Development Corporation: new UDCs to be set up

At £126 million, provision for 1987-88 is increased by £40 million over previous plans. £15 million of this is provided to start up the proposed new UDCs — in Trafford Park, Teeside, Tyne and Wear and the Black Country in the west midlands.

The success of the London Docklands Development Corporation continues. £1·5 billion of private investment commitments have so far been attracted to the London Docklands Development Corporation's area: 300 companies have moved into docklands, 8,000 new jobs have been provided, and nearly 10,000 private homes have been commenced or completed since the establishment of the corporation in 1981. The increased public expenditure provision for UDCs will enable LDDC to boost the pace of regeneration still further.

On Merseyside, the UDC expects to have reclaimed 146 hectares of land for housing, commercial and recreational use by March 1987, and to have achieved 946 permanent and 700 temporary new jobs. Priorities for next year include the completion of the Albert docks development and of the South docks infrastructure work.

Urban Programme and Derelict Land — continuing support

Our plans for 1987-88 include provision of £324 million for the urban programme and £81 million for the derelict land reclamation programme. These figures are respectively an increase of £7 million and £3 million over initial provision for the current year. The urban development grant programme will continue as part of the urban programme, and the new urban regeneration grant will be also available to support private-sector-led regeneration activity on difficult sites in urban areas.

New Towns

The primary objective of the corporations is to round off development of their towns. New investment on non-housing services is mainly directed at completing the physical infrastructure and facilitating the provision of employment opportunities with a maximum level of private investment. Receipts obtained by new town bodies (mainly from the sale of industrial and commercial assets) now exceed gross expenditure and are continuing to grow. The gross capital provision on other environmental services has been set at £36 million for 1987-88, with expected receipts of almost £150 million.

Heritage: A period of consolidation

At £114 million, provision for the heritage programmes in 1987-88 is £75 million over provision for the current year. The Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission receives an additional £2 million mainly to strengthen its cost-effective programme of repair grants to the private sector, including churches.

Nature Conservation: more resources

The Countryside Commission's grant-in-aid will rise from £17·7 million this year to £19·5 million in 1987-88, representing a 61 per cent. increase in real terms since 1979. This latest increase will enable the commission to press ahead with its programme for improving access to the countryside, providing conservation advice to farmers, landowners and voluntary groups and encouraging increased cost-effective activity in the voluntary sector. Targets for the expanded grant programme include the planting of 2 million trees and the establishment of five new groundwork trusts.

12. The Nature Conservancy Council's grant rises from £32 million this year to £36·5 million in 1987-88. This year the council will reach its target of re-notifying 80 per cent. of the sites of special scientific interest in Britain, and it has enabled me to designate Britain's first statutory marine nature reserve, on Lundy Island. Priorities for next year will be to protect more sites and to improve the council's research and monitoring capacity.

Water: Continued Improvements in Efficiency

Water authorities operating efficiency continues to improve without any detrimental effect on service standards. Under performance aims set by the Government, real terms operating costs have reduced by 6·2 per cent. since 1982-83. Further aims will be set for the three years to 1989-90.

The increased volume of investment achieved in the current year will be maintained in 1987-88 with further increases in 1988-89 and 1989-90. This will make for continued improvements in services, water quality and environmental standards. In 1987-88 water charges will increase by under 6 per cent. on average. No authority should need to increase its charges by more than 7 per cent.

Local Authority Capital Expenditure: £700 million extra for 1987-88

Gross provision for capital expenditure on the main local authority services is increased by about £700 million, from the previously planned level, to just under £5,000 million. Allocations total over £2,600 million. The prescribed proportions of capital receipts, which can be used to supplement allocations are maintained: spending power from this is estimated in the White Paper to increase to about £2,800 million next year.

I announced on 15 October that we will not be carrying out a major reform of the control of local authority capital expenditure in the present Session of Parliament. Instead we propose to consider the reform of the present system alongside the rest of the proposals in the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government".

Local authority current expenditure: £3·38 billion more

Local authority public expenditure provision relevant for Exchequer grants in 1987-88 is increased by £3·38 billion over previous provision. This includes £460 million which is dependent on the Government's requirements on pay structure and duties being met in a teachers' pay settlement.

Newham

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North West): To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the housing investment programme allocation for the London borough of Newham for each of the last five years.

Mr. Tracey [pursuant to his reply 13 January 1987]: The housing investment programme allocations for the London borough of Newham for each of the last five years are given in the table:

	Allocations £m	Expenditure £m
1986-87	21·699	[1]47,224
1985-86	21·574	28·849
1984-85	23·310	40·979
1983-84	20·361	33·238
1982-83	22·162	17·542

[1] Estimated.

Since 1981-82 local authorities have, in addition to their HIP allocations, been able to increase their capital spending power by a prescribed proportion of their receipts from sales of assets, including council houses. The table therefore also gives, for comparison, Newham's total capital expenditure on housing in those years.

Agricultural Buildings and Works

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland, Official Report, 17 December, column 592, he will indicate the clarification he has given in reply to the representations received about his proposals to extend planning controls to new livestock building and associated structures.

Mr. Tracey [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987]: I shall write to the hon. Member.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Refugee-related Infrastructure Projects

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much of the £5 million pledged by Her Majesty's Government to cover refugee-related infrastructure projects has already been disbursed within the ICARA II framework; on what projects; and whether he intends to commit further resources to such refugee-related infrastructure projects.

Mr. Chris Patten: Of the £2.3 million committed to date, some £1.3 million has already been disbursed.

Eighteen projects have been supported in the fields of agricultural development, community development, small-scale industries and income-generation, primary education, adult education and water supply. Countries assisted include Sudan, Rwanda, Chad, Somalia, Botswana, Guinea (Conakry) and Zimbabwe.

Efforts are being made to accelerate commitments under the £5 million pledge. I shall review the situation when the pledge has been fully committed.

WALES

Land Authority

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will make a statement on the progress of the Land Authority for Wales since 20 June 1984.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: During the financial year ending 31 March 1986 the Land Authority acquired about 128 hectares (317 acres) of land and disposed of about 69 hectares (171 acres) for residential, industrial and commercial purposes. Its land bank consisted of about 533 hectares (1,317 acres). About £5.9 million was spent on acquisition of land and provision of infrastructure, and income was about £5.0 million. The net profit for the year was £0.9 million and accumulated profits some £5 million. The authority's net worth at 31 March 1986 stood at some £12.8 million. Annual review reports updating the housing land availability studies have been published for the counties of Clwyd, Dyfed, Gwent and Mid, South and West Glamorgan.

We are satisfied that the Land Authority for Wales has continued to play a valuable role in facilitating economic development in Wales. It is particularly noteworthy that during this period the authority was instrumental in bringing about the first phase of the redevelopment of south Cardiff.

EMPLOYMENT

Restart Scheme

Mr. Marlow asked the Paymaster General what are the latest figures, expressed as numbers and percentage by region, for (a) the numbers of restart letters sent out, (b) the numbers of second letters sent out, (c) the numbers who have been sent letters out but not yet attended interviews and (d) the numbers who have left the register (i) without any response to the programme and (ii) subsequent to interview and counselling.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

YTS

Mr. Watts asked the Paymaster General whether the Government's undertaking that all unemployed minimum age school leavers would be offered a suitable two-year place in YTS by Christmas 1986 has been met; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I am very pleased to say that the Government's undertaking has been effectively met in this the first year of two-year YTS as it was in the three years during which the one-year youth training scheme was in operation. There are around 347,000 trainees currently on YTS and on 5 January only 2,376 young people were waiting for the offer of a place. The comparable figures for 1985, 1984 and 1983 were 2,290, 3,853 and 4,320 respectively.

Young people have been quick to grasp the opportunities which two-year YTS affords them to obtain high quality training leading to recognised vocational qualifications. The fact that we are now able to guarantee all unemployed minimum age school leavers the offer of a two-year place is a tremendous achievement and a great credit to the Manpower Services Commission and all others involved.

Training Schemes

Mr. Dobson asked the Paymaster General what was the total of people on Department of Employment schemes in Greater London in 1978 and in each year since; and how many of these were aged (a) 16 to 17, (b) 17 to 18, (c) 18 to 19 and (d) 19 to 20 years.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987]: It is not possible to give precise total figures because of the various bases on which local information is collected.

Almost all the employment, training and enterprise measures run by the Department of Employment and the Manpower Services Commission provide opportunities for young people, but a breakdown showing the numbers of young people benefiting from the schemes in the form requested is available only at disproportionate cost. Some of the schemes, however, are aimed specifically at young people. These are YTS, community industry and the new workers scheme, which are currently operating; previous schemes for young people which we were operating during this period but which have now closed were the youth opportunities programme and the young workers scheme.

The number of people who have participated in the training opportunities programme, the youth training scheme, community industry, adult training, the enterprise allowance scheme, voluntary projects programme, the special temporary employment programme, the community enterprise programme, the community programme and the temporary short-time working compensation scheme in Greater London are as follows with figures for the schemes aimed specifically at young people shown separately.

			YOP/YTS and CI
1978	5,522	including	5,292
1979	9,658	including	6,652
1980	39,792	including	11,397
1981	41,759	including	20,369
1982	31,622	including	17,341
1983	49,802	including	22,722
1984	59,378	including	24,588
1985	71,869	including	24,371
1986	77,748	including	18,665

In addition, in London and the south-east the following numbers of people were participating in the job release scheme, and job splitting scheme, the young workers scheme and the new workers scheme.

			YWS/NWS
1978	4,319	including	—
1979	14,425	including	—
1980	14,506	including	—
1981	11,719	including	—
1982	53,887	including	36,758
1983	53,350	including	33,629
1984	33,624	including	16,158
1985	20,351	including	10,379
1986	11,387	including	6,405

YWS was not introduced until 1982. The temporary employment subsidy was also operating during this period, but the number of people participating in the scheme in Greater London and the south-east is available only at disproportionate cost.

PRIME MINISTER

Value Added Tax

Mr. Spearing asked the Prime Minister if, further to her answer to the hon. Member for Newham, South on 8 December 1986, Official Report, column 28, she will state the response of Her Majesty's Government to the requirements to impose value added tax on civil engineering and construction (other than domestic housing), industrial fuels, and news services; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I can assure the hon. Member that the European Commission's challenge on all the goods and services in the zero rate case is being strenuously contested by Her Majesty's Government.

Fishing Industry

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Prime Minister if she will review co-ordination between the Secretary of State for Defence and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food with respect to decisions on the approval sought for the Russian Klondyker vessels to tranship mackerel in Falmouth Bay, in view of the effects of the delay on the Scottish fishing fleet; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Security considerations must be taken fully into account in deciding on the stationing of east European factory vessels for trans-shipping purposes in United Kingdom ports. I am satisfied with arrangements for consultation between the Fisheries Departments and the Ministry of Defence on this matter.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Theft

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal how many cases of theft from hon. Members' and hon. Members' secretaries' offices were reported to the head of security in 1986; in how many cases the culprits were identified; how many people were removed from employment within the Palace of Westminster as a result; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: Eight cases of theft from hon. Members' and hon. Members' secretaries' offices were reported to the head of security in 1986. The culprits have not yet been identified, but investigations are continuing.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will review the security measures taken to prevent theft from hon. Members' and hon. Members' secretaries' offices in the Palace of Westminster; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: The security measures which are taken in the Palace of Westminster are kept continually under review.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Procurator Fiscal, Kilmarnock

Mr. Lambie asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland when he next plans to vist the procurator fiscal's office is Kilmarnock.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I expect to visit the procurator fiscal's office in Kilmarnock on 30 January 1987.

Legal Aid

44. Mr. McKelvey asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he has any plans to meet the Sheriff Principal to discuss the effects of cases of refusal of legal aid.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I have no such plans.

High Court, Glasgow

46. Mr. Fairbairn asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many cases were prosecuted in the High Court in Glasgow in the last year for which figures are available.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: In 1986 approximately 384 cases were indicted or adjourned into 25 sittings of the High Court in Glasgow. Of that number, 92 cases are recorded as pleas of guilty and 205 as having gone to trial. The balance comprises cases which were not called, deserted, adjourned or in which the accused failed to appear.

Tobacco Products (Under-age Sales)

48. Mr. Foulkes asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland whether there have been any prosecutions for the sale of tobacco products to children in the last 12 months.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: These statistics are not available.

TRANSPORT

A46-A47 Link Road

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport why he gave approval to the A46-A47 link road in east Leicester; what representations he received against the scheme; and if he will provide a breakdown by party.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The A46-A47 link road is the responsibility of Leicestershire county council, the highway authority. The scheme was accepted for transport supplementary grant in the 1985-86 financial year in recognition of its more than local traffic importance. The grant enables county councils to plan and finance major schemes. Acceptance for grant does not imply any views on the detailed aspects of any statutory orders which may still be necessary for the scheme.

The link road was included in the approved county structure plan after the examination in public in 1979. We cannot now identify individual objectors. I understand the link was not specifically mentioned in the list of matters examined or the ensuing report of the panel.

Car Parking

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now implement section 7 of the Road Traffic Act 1974, to ban car parking on footways, verges and central reservations in urban areas.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department has today published a discussion paper which looks at the reasons for pavement parking and the problems it causes. It puts forward various options for tackling the problem and invites interested bodies to comment. The Department has also produced a leaflet summarising the discussion paper which will be made available to the general public. Copies of the discussion paper and leaflet have been placed in the Library.

Driving Tests

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Transport what his plans are to improve the ability of his Driver Testing and Training Organisation to respond quickly and cost effectively to demand for driving tests.

Mr. Moore: From 1 April 1987 the Driver Testing and Training Organisation will be treated as a central Government trading body for the purposes of public expenditure and national accounting. This arrangement means that direct current expenditure by DTT will no longer count as public expenditure or against the gross running cost limits of the Department on the Transport Services and Central Administration Vote (VIII. 2.) Similarly, its fee receipts will no longer be an offset against public expenditure totals. In future, DTT's expenditure (including an assessed charge for general support still provided from the Department of Transport) and the associated fee receipts, will be brought to account on the non-cash limited Transport Industries Vote (VIII. 3).

The new arrangement will enable DTT to respond more quickly than in the past to changes in demand for tests and therefore to improve the service to the public. DTT's activities will be subject to unit cost targets consistent with efficient and effective use of resources and the recovery of its costs in fees.

Accordingly the costs and fee income of the DTT organisation are omitted from this year's public expenditure White Paper, published today. I shall arrange for DTT to produce an annual report and accounts after each financial year, which will be laid in the House of Commons Library.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

In-service Staff Development

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department's circular 6/86 is intended to fund in-service staff development; and what steps he will take to ensure that no sector is excluded from an adequate share in terms of in-service staff development.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The arrangements for grant-aid set out in the circular encourage local authorities to promote the training of teachers, educational psychologists, youth and community workers and education inspectors and advisers in a more systematic and purposeful way. Local authorities are required to address the needs of each of these groups in their locality in the training proposals on which grant-aid is based.

Research Activities

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he has taken to encourage greater concentration and selectivity of research activities.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend is advised on the distribution of funds for research by the Advisory Board for the Research Councils, and the University Grants Committee, and he has encouraged these bodies to adopt an increasingly selective approach. Progress has been achieved through the major restructuring being undertaken by research councils, including the rationalisation of sites, and re-ordering of scientific priorities; and through the more selective procedures adopted by the UGC in its distribution of research funds. The ABRC will further address the question of selectivity and concentration, in consultation with the UGC, in the strategy document it is preparing which will form part of its advice to my right hon. Friend in the spring of this year.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Chinese Refugees

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to how many political refugees from China are now living in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: Information is not available in the form requested. However, the numbers of Chinese nationals granted refugee status or exceptional leave to remain in the United Kingdom in the years 1979 to 1985 are given in table 1 and 5A to 5F of Home Office Statistical Bulletin, "Refugee Statistics, United Kingdom 1985" (issue 12/86).

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have made application to be considered as political refugees from China in the last year.

Mr. Waddington: Provisional information indicates that one Chinese national made an application to be considered as a refugee in the 12 months ending 30 September 1986.

Prison Chapels

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) for what purposes prison chapels may be used other than for religious services and acts of worship;

(2) how many prison chapels are dedicated for exclusive use as places of worship;

(3) what is his policy regarding the use of prison chapels as cinemas for inmates;

(4) if he is satisfied that Pentonville prison chapel is being properly used by staff and inmates.

Mr. Mellor: All prison chapels are dedicated as places of worship to be used primarily for acts of worship and religious services. The few Roman Catholic chapels where there is the Reserved Sacrament may be used only for religious purposes. Apart from these chapels a prison chapel may have wider uses, provided that due regard and respect are had for its primary religious purpose. Alternative uses of this kind include staff and offical meetings, seminars, exhibitions, concerts and training groups for inmates in circumstances where alternative accommodation of a suitable size is not available.

In a few establishments, including Pentonville, it has been necessary to use the chapel as a cinema because of the lack of an alternative venue for this purpose. I have no reason to believe that improper use is being made of chapels by staff or inmates either at Pentonville or elsewhere.

Prisons (Films)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance is given for the selection and showing of films in prisons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Now that the Video Recordings Act 1984 has come into force, advice will be given to governors on its implication for the selection and showing of films in prisons.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Export Management Training (Exhibition)

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department has considered an application for an exhibition relating to Export Management Training to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Channon: Arrangements have been made for such an exhibition in the Upper Waiting Hall to take place from Monday 26 January to Friday 30 January 1987.

Rover Group

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the Rover Group corporate plan, indicating what extra financial assistance he proposes to offer to ensure its successful implementation.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Rover Group 1987 corporate plan was delivered to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 22 December 1986 and is now being considered. Once that process of consideration is complete my right hon. Friend will announce the Government's response. Until then it would be inappropriate to comment on any aspect of the plan's content.

Guinness plc

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will call for an interim report from the inspectors appointed to investigate the affairs of Guinness.

Mr. Howard: No. I have consulted the inspectors, who agree that preparation of an interim report at this stage would impede their investigation. This question, will, however, be kept under review.

Mr. Geoffrey Collier

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the report he has received from the inspectors appointed under the Financial Services Act to investigate share dealing by Mr. Geoffrey Collier.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. Friend does not propose to publish reports by inspectors appointed under section 177 of the Financial Services Act. Such reports are akin to reports made by the police to the Director of Public Prosecutions rather than to reports by inspectors appointed under the Companies Act. Their purpose is to advise my right hon. Friend whether any individual appears to have contravened the Company Securities (Insider Dealing) Act, and to assist him in deciding whether to institute criminal proceedings. If an individual is prosecuted the substance of the inspectors' report will be disclosed in open court. Conversely, individuals who are not prosecuted are entitled to have their involvement in an investigation kept confidential.

Condoms

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied with existing competition in the condom market; what is the current market share of the major producers; how many recent requests he has had to refer this situation to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The supply of contraceptive sheaths was referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission for investigation in 1972 and 1981. The MMC concluded in its second report that a monopoly situation existed in favour of LRC Products Ltd. (now the London International Group) by virtue of the company's United Kingdom market share, estimated at between 90 and 95 per cent. As a result, LRC Products Ltd. gave undertakings in 1983 to limit price increases by relation to an index of its costs. These undertakings, which are still in force, are being closely monitored by the Director General of Fair Trading.

The Director General of Fair Trading has powers under the Fair Trading Act 1973 to make a further reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission if he considers it necessary.

Industry (Incentives)

Mr. Brandon Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are Her Majesty's Government's plans for expenditure on incentives to industry in the assisted areas in 1987-88.

Mr. Channon: The present public expenditure provision for regional incentives in 1987-88 is £419 million, an increase of 9 per cent., that is £36 million, on the provision contained in last year's public expenditure White Paper. Within this increased provision it has been decided that payment of grant on new applications under the new RDG scheme, RDG II, will be made two months after a claim has been approved. This will help to ensure that expenditure on regional incentives stays within 1987-88 public expenditure plans. Grants under the old RDG scheme, RDG I, will continue to be paid four months after claims have been approved.

Companies Act Investigations

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list in the Official Report investigations under the Companies Act initiated in the past 10 years stating (a) the date when inspectors were appointed, (b) the date of any interim report and (c) the date of their final report, if received, to date.

Mr. Howard: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

EC Industrial Council

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress made at the December European Community Council of Industry Ministers.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The last Industrial Council of the United Kingdom presidency met under my chairmanship on 22 December. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry represented the United Kingdom.

The Council approved a new directive on state aid to shipbuilding to replace the fifth directive, which expired on 31 December 1986.

Under the new directive, which is to last four years, all subsidies that influence shipbuilding decisions will now have to be disclosed and they will be subject to a common maximum ceiling.

For the first 12 months, the Commission has set the ceiling at 28 per cent. of cost, that is 28 per cent. of the value of contract before aid. Assistance at this level represents 39 per cent. of the resulting contract price. This compares with the maximum limit on production aid of 18·4 per cent. of cost and 22½ per cent. on price available to United Kingdom shipbuilders under the fifth directive. The directive requires the Commission to make arrangements so that the level of aid provided for small ships, those costing less than 6 million ecu, where the impact of international competition from beyond the Community is least severe, will not exceed 20 per cent. of cost, or 25 per cent. of the resulting price.

The total amount of operating support a yard can receive over the course of a year, including compensation for losses as well as contract support, is also subject to the ceiling. In addition, the directive also permits in certain circumstances aid for investment, research and development, and closure. This support falls outside the ceiling.

Spain and Portugal will benefit from transitional arrangements which will exempt them from the common ceiling, though they will be obliged to compete fairly with other member states on individual contracts.

The directive represents a considerable improvement on the previous arrangements, both as regards the inclusion of all relevant subsidies, and the maximum level of subsidy permitted. We now have a directive which gives both an opportunity and an incentive to the European merchant shipbuilding industry to compete against the far east.

The Council also agreed three proposals in the Community's action programme for completing the internal market. They cover improvements to the EC supplies directives, specifying rules for the award of public sector supplies contracts; rules on the use of European standards for public purchases of IT and telecommunications equipment; and noise limits for hydraulic diggers and excavators. These three measures concluded the package of 13 measures discussed at the Internal Market Council on 1 December and, as a result, the number of internal market measures agreed or adopted during the United Kingdom presidency amounted to 48. This represents a substantial acceleration of progress towards the completion of the internal market by 1991.

In addition, the Council agreed a programme of further work aimed at opening up public procurement in the Community, and adopted a regulation for a 1987 tariff quota for Canary Islands cigars and cigarettes.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Mr. Oleg Gordievsky

Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been received from relatives of Ivan Oleg Gordievsky about his detention in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Renton: It is not our practice to comment on security matters.

NATO Information Service

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much is being spent on (a) the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation information service in the current year, and (b) how much of this is the United Kingdom's contribution; what was the comparable figure in 1976; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The figures are:

	1986	1976
Total Budget	Belgian Francs 143 million (£2·42 million)	Belgian Francs 65 million (£823,000)
United Kingdom contribution	Belgian Francs 26·9 million (£456,000 or 18·82 per cent.)	Belgian Francs 12·6 million (£160,000 or 19·5 per cent.)

It is important that information about NATO, which is and will continue to be the bedrock of Western security, should be widely disseminated. We fully support the efforts of the NATO information service to this end.

Council of Ministers (Presidency)

Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will review the achievements of the United Kingdom's presidency of the Council of Ministers of the European Community.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer to my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) on 19 December 1986 at columns 761-62.

Australia

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations with Australia following the Wright case.

Mr. Eggar: Our relations remain excellent.

Colonial Prisoners

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many convicted criminals and criminally insane are currently held under the provisions of the Colonial Prisoners Removal Acts; where they were removed from; and where they are now held.

Mr. Eggar: There are no convicted criminals or criminally insane persons held in any dependent territory under the Colonial Prisoners Removal Acts.

There are six prisoners convicted of offences in British dependent territories who are serving sentence in the United Kingdom under the provisions of the Colonial Prisoners Removal Acts at the request of the authorities of the territory where the prisoner was sentenced. All but one of these cases, which is under consideration, are held here at the expence of the territory concerned. Two of the prisoners are from St. Helena, one from the British Indian Ocean Territory, two from Bermuda and one from the Turks and Caicos Islands.

Additionally, there are a small number of persons normally resident in the United Kingdom who have been convicted of crimes in the dependent territories and transferred to this country under the Acts to serve their sentences, but there is no central record of such transfers.

Grants

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which organisations funded by his Department, other than the United Nations Association, have not had their grant increased in the past five years.

Mr. Eggar: Apart from the UNA, other organisations receiving funds from the diplomatic wing of the FCO which have not had their grant increased in the past five years are:

British Commonwealth Ex-Servicemen's League
College of Europe
South African War Graves Commission

Diplomats (Parking Fines)

Mr Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, pursuant to the answer of 16 December, Official Report, columns 446-50, he will publish figures showing for each of the last five years, in alphabetical order by country, the number of unpaid parking fines incurred by each diplomatic mission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Details of the total number of fixed penalty notices cancelled on the ground of diplomatic immunity for the years 1981, 1982 and 1983 were given to my hon.

Friend by my hon. Friend the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), on 13 February 1985, at column 193. The table gives the details for the years 1984, 1985 and the first three quarters of 1986 (the latest figures available). These figures are based on information received up to 8 January 1987 and may be further reduced by late payments. We welcome the very significant downward trend and expect the holders of diplomatic immunity to continue it in the future.

Entry Visas (Ghana)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the waiting time for the issue of entry visas from Ghana at the latest date.

Mr. Eggar: For business men and other regular visitors to the United Kingdom entry clearances, including multiple entry visas valid for two years, are normally granted within two days. For visitors who need a short interview the waiting time is currently two weeks. Applicants for settlement are normally interviewed within one month.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current waiting list for the issue of entry visas from Ghana and the figure over the past five years.

Mr. Eggar: As at 31 December 1986, 200 people were awaiting interview, 190 applications for visit visas and 10 for settlement.

Over the five years to 22 October 1986, during which period most visitors travelled without entry clearances, the waiting time was normally two or three days extending up to two weeks during the summer season. Settlement applicants during this period were invariable interviewed within one month.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans there are to reduce the waiting list for entry visas from Ghana; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The current two weeks waiting time for the minority of visitors who need an interview is a result of the days lost during the Christmas and new year holidays and the move to the new high commission premises which took place in December. The complement of entry clearance officers was increased from two to three last month and the high commission expects to be able to reduce the waiting time to five days by the end of January.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Benefits

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the figures for the last five available years (i) on the number of claimants who have received disablement benefit for the prescribed industrial disease C23, primary neoplasm, including papilloma, carcinoma in situ and invasive carcinoma, of the epithelial lining of the urinary tract, renal pelvis, ureter, bladder and urethra and (ii) on the number of claimants receiving such benefits who were employed in the printing industry.

Mr. Major: The following table shows the number of awards of disablement benefit for the prescribed disease C23 for the years ending September 1984-86, and the number of these awards to claimants who were employed in the printing industry. Information for earlier years is not available.

	1984	1985	1986

Abortions

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, of those abortions performed in the first quarter of 1986 (a) in emergency to save the life of the mother and (b) because of risk to the life of the mother, how many were performed on women pregnant with babies of gestation (i) 0 to 20 weeks, (ii) 21 to 24 weeks and (iii) 25 weeks or over.

Mr. Newton: Provisional figures are shown in the table, which are base on notifications received up to the end of October 1986 for terminations carried out in the March quarter 1986.

Ground 5. In emergency, to save the life of the pregnant woman.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services of those abortions performed in the latest year for which figures are available upon women of (a) 0 to 20 weeks gestation, (b) 21 to 24 weeks gestation and (c) 25 weeks and over, how many were performed (i) under the National Health Service in National Health Service centres, (ii) under the National Health Service through agency arrangements, (iii) in pay beds in National Health Service centres and (iv) in private clinics.

Mr. Newton: The information available by gestation and category of premises is shown in the table. The category of bed occupied in National Health Service hospitals is not collected in the notification of abortions carried out under the Abortion Act 1967, and information on gestation is not available from the "Hospital In-patient Enquiry".

NHS (Fuel Supply)

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what discussions he has had about the renewal of the National Coal Board's contract to supply solid fuel to the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The existing agreement for supply of coal to National Health Service authorities by British Coal (formerly National Coal Board) commenced in April 1984 and has an expiry date of March 31 1987.

In conjunction with representatives of the principal coal-burning NHS regions, the Department's director of procurement has been engaged in commercial negotiations with British Coal throughout 1986. These negotiations have taken account of the dramatic changes in world energy markets over the past 18 months and British Coal's willingness to revise its own pricing mechanisms to meet this challenge.

A new supply agreement with British Coal was agreed in principle early in December 1986 and, subject to final review and acceptance by senior NHS officers at a meeting arranged for Thursday of this week, the director and British Coal hope to announce an improved agreement covering the period 1 April 1986 to 31 March 1989.

I am advised that British Coal and regional health authorities are satisfied that the new agreement, whilst providing security of supply to NHS establishments, will also enable the market and supply situation to be kept under regular review. The agreement also takes full account of the complex distribution and usage requirements of the National Health Service and provides a sound platform for British Coal to retain and possibly extend the use of coal subject to the normal value-for-money criteria.

Condoms

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report information available to him on the unit retail price for condoms in each European Economic Community country.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has yet fixed the flat rate national insurance contributions to be paid by share fishermen and volunteer development workers for 1987-88.

Mr. Major: For 1987-88 the flat-rate national insurance contributions of share fishermen and volunteer development workers will remain at £6·55 per week.

General Practitioners (Surgery Premises)

Mr. Budgen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he proposes to take following the study he commissioned of the scope for reducing public sector involvement in funding loans to family doctors for the provision of surgery premises.

Mr. Newton: The General Practice Finance Corporation has been asked to invite private financial institutions to participate in loans to family doctors for the provision of surgery premises. The decision follows a study by Hambros bank into the feasibility of reducing public sector involvement in these loans. Hitherto the corporation's only method of providing funds for doctors has been public sector borrowing and as such this source has been subject to cash limits. The new arrangements will free the corporation from this restriction by allowing it to provide money to doctors from private sector sources such as banks and building societies. As a result, the public sector provision is being reduced significantly over the next three years. The Government are confident that the GPFC is well placed to attract private sector finance alongside public sector finance by virtue of its present excellent level of performance. Ministers will be kept closely informed of progress with this new development. We will wish to ensure that recent improvements in surgery premises are maintained, particularly in underprivileged areas.

Patient Care

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for 1985 for each region and for England as a whole the number of deaths and discharges among, and the number of beds occupied on 31 December by, patients receiving treatment under contractual arrangements with institutions outside the National Health Service; and if he will break down these figures into the categories of (a) medical, (b) surgical, (c) pre-convalescent and post-operative, (d) convalescent, (e) geriatric, (f) diseases of the chest, (g) maternity, (h) mental illness, (i) mental handicap, (j) rehabilitation, (k) terminal care and (l) others.

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many National Health Service in-patients received treatment in private hospitals in the last year for which figures are available.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 24 November 1986, c. 129-130]: The information is given in the table.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will set out, region by region, district health authority in-patient waiting lists, the total populations living in each district, the percentage which the former represents of the latter and their national ranking by that percentage;

(2) if he will set out, region by region, the hospital urgent in-patient waiting list in each health district, together with the number of urgent cases waiting more than a month, the percentage the latter represents of the former and their national ranking in England by that percentage;

(3) if he will set out, region by region the hospital non-urgent in-patient waiting list in each health district, together with the numbers of non-urgent cases waiting more than a year, the percentage the latter represents of the former and their national ranking in England by that percentage.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 10 December 1986, c. 215-16]: The information requested is given in the tables.

Resident population is not a reliable indicator in this context as hospitals provide services for patients from beyond their district health authority boundaries.

I therefore refer the hon. Member to the performance indicator package held in the statistics section of the Library. The PI package contains specialty specific PIs which relate the number on the waiting list to the catchment population for five specialties (general surgery and urology, trauma and orthopaedic, gynaecology, ear, nose and throat and ophthalmology.)

Supplementary Benefit

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the ratio of supplementary benefit claimants to staff in (a) each local office of his Department in London, (b) the average in each social security region and (c) the national average for 1 August 1983, 1984, 1985 and 1986.

Mr. Lyell [pursuant to his reply, 15 December 1986, c. 419]: The ratio of supplementary benefit claimants to staff in (a) each local office in London, (b) the average for each social security region, and (c) the national average for 1 August 1983-86 is shown in the table.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Member's Correspondence

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the reply of 17 November 1986, Official Report, column 84, regarding the latest estimates of revenue raised by taxing benefits to the unemployed, when the hon. Member for Oldham, West can expect to receive the letter containing the relevant information.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I regret the delay in providing revised estimates of the yield from taxing benefits paid to the unemployed.

Revised estimates are as follows:

	£ million
1982-83	[1]300
1983-84	375
1984-85	400
1985-86	400
1986-87	400

[1] Unemployment benefits became taxable on 5 July 1982.

Revenue received from the taxation of benefits paid to the unemployed is not separately identifiable in the collection of tax. Therefore, estimates of the yield are produced by using information on total benefits paid, periods of unemployment, income from employment and tax allowances and reliefs.

Previous estimates were based on aggregate information from several sources and used very broad assumptions. They were subject to wide margins of error. The revised estimates are based on national amounts of benefits paid to the unemployed and information about the individual circumstances of the unemployed respondents to the "Family Expenditure Survey" (FES). From this detailed information, average marginal rates of tax have been estimated and applied to the national levels of benefits paid. The revised estimates were derived using the 1984 FES and may be further revised when later information becomes available.

Personal Taxation

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what proportion of retirement pensioners are higher rate taxpayers;

(2) how many higher rate taxpayers there are in each of the counties in England north of the Bristol-Wash line.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

EC Presidency

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the achievements of the United Kingdom's presidency of the European Community Council of Ministers in respect of economic and financial matters.

Mr. Lawson [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987]: The Economic and Finance Council made the following major contributions to the Presidency's achievements on the completion of the internal market. On financial services, two important directives were adopted. The first extends liberalisation obligations for certain types of capital transactions in the Community, viz long-term commercial credits, transactions in listed and unlisted securities and some unit trusts. The second provides for a standardised regime for the accounts and consolidated accounts of banks in the Community. On tax and the internal market, progress was made on several structural VAT and excise duty proposals, and the Council adopted the 13th VAT directive on harmonising the system for refunding VAT to traders established in third countries.

The Economic and Finance Council agreed the substance of a new Community lending facility for small and medium-sized undertakings. 1,500 million ecus (about £1,100 million) will be made available in two equal tranches, raised by the Commission and the European Investment Bank respectively. All the lending will be managed by the EIB, and will be mainly global loans made through financial intermediaries.

The Council discussed Community spending on agriculture, leading to enunciation of presidency principles for the future operation of the common agricultural policy that:

(1) support prices should more closely reflect market conditions;

(2) the intervention system should operate as a safety net, not as a standard marketing outlet;

(3) price support policies should be flexibly operated so that risks are not borne entirely by public finance.

The Economic and Finance Council had useful discussions on the economic situation in the Community, and agreed to adopt the annual economic report for 1986-87, as amended, to take account of member states comments. The report is directed towards increasing employment in the Community in the context of monetary stability and fiscal consolidation.

The Council reviewed the progress made by the Greek economy since agreement in November 1985 to provide Greece with a Community loan of 1·75 billion ecus (about £1·25 billion). The Council agreed that the Commission should release the second tranche of the loan. In reaching its view, the Council took into account the agreement reached between the Commission and Greece on the phasing out of the Greek trade measures on export subsidies and import deposits.

On travellers' allowances, the Council made good progress on meeting individual member states' concerns in respect of duty — and tax-free shopping, against the background of its acceptance of the continuing existence of duty—and tax-free facilities as long as fiscal frontiers remain. In particular, the Commission gave an assurance that the Channel fixed link would enjoy the same fiscal treatment as other cross channel operators.

Following discussion in both the Economic and Finance Council and the Budget Council, the United Kingdom presidency secured agreement on 10 July on a new budget for the Community for 1986, only seven days after the European Court of Justice had found that the European Parliament had exceeded its powers in December 1985 in adopting a budget without the agreement of the Council of Ministers. The 1986 budget provided for a United Kingdom abatement of its VAT contribution of 1,900 million ecu (about £1,250 million).

The presidency also secured agreement at Budget Councils in September and November to first and second reading draft Community budgets for 1987 which fully respected budgetary discipline. The European Parliament did not, however, accept that the growth of non-obligatory expenditure should be restricted in accordance with the maximum rate of increase defined in the EEC treaty and, in the absence of agreement between the Council and the Parliament, the President of the Parliament was not in a position to adopt the budget. From 1 January 1987, therefore, the Community will have to operate under the provisional twelfths regime, set out in article 204 of the treaty, until an agreed budget is adopted. This limits total spending to at most the amount spent last year.

With regard to public purchasing, an area of economic policy for which the Treasury has overall policy responsibility, the Industry Council on 22 December agreed on the content of a new supplies directive to modify the early directives. This will further open up purchasing opportunities in the Community. Before the new directive is adopted it will need minor modifications to take account of changes accepted by the Community when agreement was reached on the renegotiation of the GATT agreement on government procurement on 21 November.

A detailed list of United Kingdom presidency achievements will be placed in the Library of the House shortly.

SCOTLAND

"Nature Conservation and Afforestation in Great Britain"

11. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will ask the Forestry Commission to respond to the report "Nature Conservation and Afforestation in Great Britain", compiled by the Nature Conservancy Council.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. and learned Friend will give the Government's response to the report as soon as our study of it has been completed.

Ayr Road Route

12. Mr. Allan Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his latest estimate for the start of construction on the Ayr road route.

Mr. Michael Ancram: Work is planned to start on the trunk road section towards the end of 1989.

Pratt and Whitney (Prestwick Airport)

13. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what approaches have been made by Pratt and Whitney of Canada regarding the setting up of a maintenance centre at Prestwick airport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: The company has no plans at present to expand its European operations and is unlikely to re-assess that position before the end of this year. Meanwhile Locate in Scotland will continue to maintain contact with the company.

Council of Fisheries Ministers

14. Mr. Pollock asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he attended the last meeting of the European Council of Fisheries Ministers; what subjects were discussed; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: I attended the last meeting on 17 and 18 December. The main topics discussed were the total allowable catches for fish stocks in 1987 and certain fisheries agreements with third countries.

Edinburgh District Council

15. Sir Alex Fletcher asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he proposes to take to require Edinburgh district council to apply the fullest amount of funds available to it to eliminate the backlog of housing improvement grant payments.

Mr. Rifkind: In response to representations received from my hon. Friend and others we have issued Edinburgh district council with a provisional non-HRA allocation for next year of £34·52 million. We propose to earmark £26 million of this — £5·75 million more than the council intended so spending — exclusively for the backlog of grant applications. Next year's expenditure on the backlog will, as a result of steps the Government have taken, therefore be double this year's, thus clearing about half of the city's remaining backlog of grant applications.

Labour Statistics

16. Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number and percentage of unemployed people in Greenock and Port Glasgow at the latest available date.

Mr. Lang: On 13 November 1986, the latest date for which information is available, the number of unemployed claimants in the Greenock and Port Glasgow Parliamentary constituency totalled 8,519. Unemployment rates are not calculated for parliamentary constituencies but for the Greenock travel-to-work area the rate on the same date was 20·4 per cent.

25. Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland by how much unemployment has increased in North Lanarkshire since May 1979.

Mr. Lang: Between May 1979 and November 1986 unemployment rose from 15,531 in the former North Lanarkshire travel-to-work area to 32,920 in the new Lanarkshire travel-to-work area. As a result of changes in the travel-to-work area boundaries and in the method of the count these figures are not comparable.

34. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people are currently unemployed in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: On 13 November 1986, the latest date for which information is available, the number of unemployed claimants in Scotland totalled 360,125 (14·3 per cent.).

Public Expenditure (Unemployment)

17. Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has now estimated the effects on unemployment in Scotland of his statement on public expenditure of 9 December.

Mr. Lang: The plans outlined in my right hon. and learned Friend's statement of 9 December need to be viewed in the wider context of the Government's fiscal and monetary strategy. I am satisfied that our policies offer the best hope for sustained economic growth and reduction in unemployment.

Forestry Aid Grant

18. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the agreed arrangements for consultations between the Forestry Commission and the Countryside Commission over applications for forestry grant aid where the forestry proposal occurs within a national park, area of outstanding natural beauty or environmentally sensitive area.

Mr. John MacKay: Where planting proposals of 10 hectares or more fall within a national park or an area of outstanding natural beauty, the Forestry Commission copies to the appropriate Countryside Commission regional office all the correspondence it has with the local authority in the course of consultations of the proposals. The Countryside Commission does not normally seek to comment, unless the local authority has raised objections which cannot be resolved and the case has to be referred to the Forestry Commission's regional advisory committee under the established procedures. The Countryside Commission does, however, reserve the right to approach the Forestry Commission directly at the initial stage of any application if it disagrees with the views of the local authority.

The Forestry Commission and the Countryside Commission have agreed that similar arrangements will apply within environmentally sensitive areas once these have been designated.

20. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will extend the existing consultation arrangements between the Forestry Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council over applications for forestry grant aid to areas other than those within sites of special scientific interest or possible candidates for future notification as sites of special scientific interest.

Mr. John MacKay: Any extension of the present consultation arrangements on forestry proposals is a matter for agreement between the Forestry Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council.

Planning Applications

19. Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will introduce measures to expedite the progress of planning applications; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: We have already taken a number of steps to speed up the processing of planning applications and we are fully aware of the need to ensure that new developments are not unduly delayed. The Scottish Development Department issued a circular in July 1985 advising planning authorities on improving the efficiency of their handling of planning applications. The Housing and Planning Act 1986 contains provision for the establishment of simplified planning zones; these will enable planning authorities to specify types of development allowed in an area so that developers may then undertake such development without the need for a planning application. The Act also includes power for my right hon. and learned Friend to prescribe a timetable to speed up planning appeals which are dealt with by written submissions. Other initiatives outlined in the Government's response to the fifth report from the Environment Committee, session 1985-86, entitled "Planning: Appeals, Call-In and Major Public Inquiries" (CM 43: December 1986), to improve the efficiency of the planning system in England will in general be matched by initiatives in Scotland appropriate to Scottish circumstances.

Scotch Whisky Industry

21. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received regarding future employment in the Scotch whisky industry.

Mr. Lang: Since the beginning of December 1986, the Secretary of State has received representations about employment in the industry from six hon. Members, the STUC, the Amalgamated Engineering Union and a person employed in the industry.

East Neuk of Fife

22. Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make an official visit to the East Neuk of Fife to meet representatives of the fishing industry.

Mr. John MacKay: I have at present no plans for such a visit.

Motorway Construction

23. Mr. Lambie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will increase the expenditure on roads in Scotland in the next five years to allow for more motorway construction.

Mr. Rifkind: In cash terms, projected total expenditure on motorways and trunk roads in Scotland for 1987-88 is £125 million compared with £115 million in the current year. Expenditure in subsequent years is planned to maintain a similar progression, and will provide for a significant number of new motorway schemes.

Road Upgradings

24. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many miles of road in Scotland have been upgraded to motorway or dual carriageway standard since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: Since May 1979, 78 major trunk road schemes, each costing over £1 million, have been opened to traffic. These have provided 220 miles of new or improved road, including 22 miles of motorway and 86 miles of all-purpose dual carriageway.

Conservation Organisations (Funding)

26. Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will announce provision for funding conservation organisations in Scotland.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Sir A. Fletcher) on 12 December 1986.

Afforestation (Consultations)

27. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will ask the Forestry Commission to consult the Nature Conservancy Council on all proposals for afforestation in the flow country of Caithness and Sutherland.

Mr. John MacKay: The consultation arrangements on forestry proposals in the flow country of Caithness and Sutherland are kept under review. Any extension of these consultations is a matter for agreement between the Forestry Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council.

Industrial and Employment Prospects

28. Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on Scotland's industrial and employment prospects for 1987.

Mr. Lang: Scotland is expected to benefit from the relatively favourable prospects for United Kingdom growth in 1987, but continued job losses in the oil-related sector are expected to remain an adverse factor in 1987. Mainly on this account, economic growth in Scotland may be rather slower than in the United Kingdom as a whole. A more detailed review of recent developments and short term prospects for the Scottish economy is provided in Scottish Economic Bulletin No. 34, which was published on 12 January; a copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

Blanket Afforestation

29. Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received regarding the activities of private forestry companies in Scotland; and if he will make a statement on the effects of blanket afforestation on fishing, tourism and the environment.

Mr. John MacKay: Over the past six months the Scottish Office has received over 50 letters on this subject. Most of these have been about planting in the flow country of Caithness and Sutherland.

Large-scale afforestation can be full compatible with the needs of fishing, tourism and the environment if it is properly planned and sympathetically carried out.

Unemployment (Glasgow)

30. Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the total number of unemployed people in the GEAR area of Glasgow; what plans he has to reduce this number; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: The information is not available in the precise form requested. On 13 November 1986, the latest date for which information is available, the number of unemployed claimants in the electoral wards contained wholly or partly within the Glasgow eastern area renewal project was as shown in the following table. This information is available in the Library.

The GEAR project has clearly had a major impact on the East End of Glasgow. While the project itself comes to an end on 31 March 1987, the participants within GEAR will continue to take action within their various responsibilities to improve the economic circumstances of the area. In addition, the extended range of the Manpower Services Commission employment, enterprise and training measures should have an increased impact on unemployment.

Teachers (Pay)

31. Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had with the Educational Institute of Scotland on the Main committee report on teachers' pay and conditions; and if he will make a statement.

32. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met representatives of the Educational Institute of Scotland to discuss teachers' pay; and if he will make a statement.

39. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next expects to meet the Educational Institute of Scotland to discuss teachers' pay and conditions.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer my hon. Friend and the hon. Members to the reply given to the hon. Members for Edinburgh East (Mr. Strang) and for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) by my right hon. and learned Friend today.

Agriculture and Rural Areas

33. Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures are being taken by his Department to secure the future of Scottish agriculture and of Scottish rural areas within the framework of a developing common agricultural policy.

Mr. John MacKay: The Government achieved major success during the United Kingdom presidency of the Community, in securing wide-ranging changes to the common agricultural policy. The Scottish position was, and will continue to be, fully taken into account in such negotiations and in their implementation.

Government support to Scottish agriculture in 1986-87 from my Department and other agencies, will exceed £330 million. This is clear evidence of our firm commitment to the future of this important industry.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration is being given to alternative land use and employment initiatives in rural areas in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. and learned Friend keeps these matters under continuous review.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what consultations he has had with the farming industry in Scotland regarding Her Majesty's Government's plans for alternative land use and employment initiatives in rural areas.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. and learned Friend maintains regular contact with the farming industry on these and other matters.

Greater Glasgow Health Board

35. Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when next he intends to meet the chairman of the Greater Glasgow health board to discuss its future financing.

Mr. John MacKay: My noble Friend, the Minister of State, meets all health board chairmen regularly to discuss a wide range of issues. His next scheduled meeting with chairmen is on 10 March 1987 when funding of boards will be one of the topics for discussion.

Buses (Deregulation)

36. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the effect of the deregulation of bus services on traffic congestion in city centres.

Mr. Ancram: There has been no evidence in Scotland of any significant congestion caused by deregulation, except in Glasgow where other factors appear to have contributed to problems in the city centre. The traffic commissioner will be holding an inquiry in February to determine what traffic regulation conditions, if any, are required to resolve any continuing congestion problems in Glasgow.

Tree Planting

37. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the area of land planted by trees in Scotland, Wales and England during 1986; and by how much additional acreage he expects to see such plantations develop in 1987.

Mr. John MacKay: The totals of new planting carried out in the year to 31 March 1986, by the Forestry Commission and by the private sector with the aid of grants from the Commission, were as follows:

	Hectares
Scotland	21,330
Wales	792
England	1,230

The estimates of new planting for the year to 31 March 1987 are as follows:

	Hectares
Scotland	22,000
Wales	850
England	1,600

Fishing Industry

38. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next expects to have a meeting with the Scottish fishermen's organisations to discuss the future of their industry.

Mr. John MacKay: I have frequent meetings with representatives of the Scottish fishing industry but have at present no firm plans for our next meeting.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the representatives of the Scottish fishing fleet regarding the required approval for the Russian Klondykers to operate in Falmouth bay; what action he has taken to support the Scottish fishermen; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: A number of representations have been received from the Scottish Pelagic Fishermen's Association and the Scottish Fishermen's Federation. The granting of licences for klondyking operations in English ports is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. My officials have been in regular contact with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in pursuit of the request from the Scottish fishing fleet for klondyking facilities and I hope that a decision on the matter will be taken very soon.

Manufacturing

40. Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many manufacturing jobs have been lost in Scotland since June 1979.

Mr. Lang: The number of employees in employment in manufacturing in Scotland is provisionally estimated to have fallen by 192,000 between June 1979 and June 1986.

Historic Buildings Council

2. Mr. Fairbairn asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what properties he intends to benefit from his announced increased grant to the Historic Buildings Council.

Mr. Rifkind: I have yet to determine which properties should benefit from the increased resources to be made available for historic buildings grants in 1987-88 but in reaching any such decisions I shall, as usual, be guided by the advice of the Historic Buildings Council for Scotland.

Sheriff Courts

Mr. Martin asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many defendants have appeared in the sheriff courts in Scotland during the past year without legal representatives.

Mr. Lang: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Hospitals (Maintenance)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with health boards on problems of maintenance in hospitals due for replacement by new general hospitals.

Mr. John MacKay: The routine maintenance of all hospital buildings in Scotland is the responsibility of health boards until the property is sold. My Department makes a special allocation of funds for backlog maintenance projects which are carried out in accordance with priorities determined by the board concerned. In addition regular discussions are held between my officials and area maintenance managers on matters relating to the maintenance of the NHS estate in Scotland.

Prisons (Disturbances)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will now make it his policy to set up an inquiry team of a judge and three lay assessors to investigate the whole Scottish prison system in view of the recent disturbances at a number of Scottish prisons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: No. Appropriate steps have been taken to investigate or pursue issues arising from the recent incidents in Scottish prisons.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, in the light of recent disturbances at Scottish prisons, he will consider setting up a highly trained unit of specialists to deal with any future disturbances in order to reduce stress and strain on prison officers and their families.

Mr. Lang: While the Scottish prison service in co-operation with the police has the capability and expertise to deal with the disturbances experienced at Scottish prisons in recent months, I share the concern of my hon. Friend for prison officers and their families. Our arrangements and procedures are constantly under review and I will bear his suggestion in mind.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the additional police and prison costs as a result of the recent disturbance at Peterhead prison; and if he will list these in the Official Report.

Mr. Lang: The information is as follows:

	Police £'000	Prison £'000
Staff	16	73
Supplies	9	19
Buildings	—	250
	25	342

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has considered what further training should be given to prison officers in self-protection against assault in view of recent disturbances at Scottish prisons, including Peterhead prison.

Mr. Lang: Prison officers are trained in the use of demonstration control techniques to deal with large scale disturbances, and in the use of control and restraint techniques to deal with individual inmates who may be violent or disturbed, where the requirement is to minimise the risk of injury to inmates and staff. The content of training is kept under regular review and will be looked at in the light of recent events.

Prison Officers

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the Scottish Prison Officers Association regarding the need for increases in the number of prison officers at Scottish prison establishments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: There are regular meetings with representatives of the Scottish Prison Officers' Association at local and national level at which various issues, including staffing levels, are discussed. Representations have been made about staffing levels at individual establishments. The number of prison officers has increased by 17 per cent. to 2,750 over the past six years, while the prison population has increased by 15 per cent.

Peterhead Prison

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will indicate the number of prisoners' places available at Peterhead prison and the number of prisoners housed there in the years 1979 to 1986, giving the details for each year.

Mr. Lang: The information requested is:

Year	Places	Average number of prisoners
1979	354	274
1980	354	231
1981	354	213
1982	329	197
1983	281	196
1984	281	185
1985	281	188
1986	281	182

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will indicate the number of prison officers employed at Peterhead prison; and whether this is fully up to establishment.

Mr. Lang: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to receive the report from Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons in Scotland into the recent disturbance at Peterhead prison.

Mr. Lang: As I indicated in my reply of 17 November at c. 53 to the hon. Member, Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons for Scotland has been asked to complete his investigation into complaints about conditions and treatment of prisoners at Peterhead prison, and report to the Secretary of State as quickly as possible. It is for HMCIP himself to decide when his independent investigation is sufficiently complete for the report to be submitted. I know that HMCIP is well aware of the importance and urgency of reporting as quickly as possible.

Prisons (Overcrowding)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland in how many prisons in Scotland there is overcrowding in prison cells; what steps he is proposing to end the situation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: There is at present overcrowding of varying degrees in Aberdeen, Barlinnie, Edinburgh, Greenock, Inverness and Perth prisons and Longriggend remand institution. Phase II of Shotts prison, which will provide 468 new places this summer together with the retention of Low Moss prison should largely eliminate overcrowding provided that there is no significant increase in the inmate population or loss of accommodation.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Scottish Fishing Fleet

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what assessment he has made of the effect on the Scottish fishing fleet of the delay in approving entry into Falmouth Bay for the Russian klondykers to tranship the mackerel catch; and if he will make a statement;

(2) why the members of the Scottish fishing fleet who normally operate in the south-west mackerel box are being denied the right to commence catching; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Alternative Land Use

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consideration is being given to alternative land use and employment initiatives in rural areas.

Mr. Donald Thompson: As the right hon. Member will know, I have been pursuing the reform of the common agricultural policy vigorously in Brussels. The various implications, including alternative land use and the effect on the rural economy remain under active consideration.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish a White Paper on alternative land use and employment initiatives in rural areas.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I shall continue to give careful consideration to the best method of keeping all concerned informed about my policies in this and other areas.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consultations he has had with the National Farmers Union on alternative land use and employment initiatives in rural areas.

Mr. Donald Thompson: My Department has regular discussions with the National Farmers Union about the Government's policies for agriculture and the reform of the common agricultural policy including alternative land use and the implications for the rural economy.

DEFENCE

Scottish Fishing Fleet

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Defence why he has not so far approved the Russian klondyker vessels entry into Falmouth Bay for the transhipment of mackerel; if he will now issue his approval in view of the effects on the Scottish fishing fleet; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: This matter is still under consideration.

ENERGY

Fuel Prices

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will have urgent discussions with major oil companies to establish the reason for the increase in prices of fuel at the pumps at stations throughout Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Oil product prices are not set by Government. They are a matter for the oil companies and reflect the cost of supplies and the level of competition in the market.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if he will publish a table showing the most recent rates of unemployment in (a) all travel-to-work areas receiving regional development grants, (b) all travel-to-work areas receiving only regional selective assistance, (c) travel-to-work areas which receive no assistance but have rates higher than in (a) and (b), and (d) travel-to-work areas which receive no assistance but have rates within 2 per cent. of any in (a) and (b).

Mr. Lee: Following are tables giving the requested information for travel-to-work areas as at 11 December 1986. Table A shows the 42 travel-to-work areas which have development area status; table B the 57 travel-to-work areas which have intermediate area status; table C the 69 travel-to-work areas that receive no assistance but have rates higher than any in tables A or B; and table D shows the other 55 travel-to-work areas that receive no assistance but have rates within 2 per cent. of any in tables A and B.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Woolwich (Prison and Court Complex)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the latest estimated cost of (a) the new Woolwich prison and (b) the associated court complex.

Mr. Mellor: The latest estimated cost of the new Woolwich prison is £63·85 million. The latest estimated cost of the associated court complex is £10·93 million.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the expected start and completion dates of (a) the new Woolwich prison and (b) the associated court complex.

Mr. Mellor: Advance works for the new Woolwich prison and the associated court complex started in May 1986 and are expected to be completed in May 1987. The main contract for the court complex is due to start in February 1988 and is expected to be completed by April 1990. A further month will be required to bring the court complex into operation. The main contract for the prison is due to start in June 1987 and is expected to be completed mid to late 1991. A further three months will be required after the buildings are handed over before the first prisoners can be received.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many local job opportunities he expects to be created by (a) the new Woolwich prison and (b) the associated court complex.

Mr. Mellor: It is not possible to say precisely how many job opportunities are likely to be created, but direct employment by Woolwich prison may provide 20-25 jobs locally and the court complex about a further 10. Furthermore, in excess of 500 people, many of whom could be locally recruited will be required during the construction work.

Drug Misuse

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has about the national crusade against drug abuse launched by President and Mrs. Reagan in the United States of America; and what lessons he has drawn for the United Kingdom in terms of providing additional ideas to assist Her Majesty's Government's drug misuse strategy.

Mr. Mellor: The United States authorities keep us informed about all aspects of their strategy to combat drug misuse. Several components in our drugs policy have reflected lessons drawn from their experience. In particular, we constantly stress that Government action alone is not enough to tackle drug misuse; we need the support and commitment of the entire community.

Licensing Laws

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer of 20 November, Official Report, column 292, when he expects to be in a position to say whether legislation might be introduced to reform the licensing laws in England; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I cannot yet indicate the possible timing of any such announcement. A Private Member's Bill on this subject has recently been introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart).

Police Officers (Widows' Pensions)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why he has not approved the agreement reached at the police negotiating board to increase the pensions of widows of police officers who retired before 1956; what is the weekly amount of the increase disallowed and the approximate amount cost of the pension disallowed.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to a question from the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) on 12 January at column 73.

Forensic Science Service

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the terms of reference and expected timetable of the Home Office review of the forensic science service.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The contribution of the Home Office forensic science service to the investigation and detection of crime is being considered as part of a wide-ranging review of the scientific support required by the police service in England and Wales and how this might best be provided. A separate exercise is about to be undertaken to measure the work being done in the operational laboratories of the forensic science service. The terms of reference for this study are to be discussed with the departmental trade union side shortly. Both reviews are expected to have been completed by August 1987.

Electronic Data Systems

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what investigation is being carried out by the immigration service into advice from staff of Electronic Data Systems, a copy of which has been sent to him by the hon. Member for Linlithgow, about their behaviour when undergoing immigration control;

(2) when he expects to reach a decision as to whether to take legal action against Electronic Data Systems in relation to alleged breaches of immigration rules.

Mr. Waddington: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Member's Correspondence

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth may expect to receive a reply to his letters of 15 August 1986 and 20 November 1986 which refer to Mr. V. R. Taylor of Rugby.

Mr. Mellor: I regret the delay which occurred in dealing with my hon. Friend's letters. I have written to him today.

News International Plant, Wapping

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements have been made to provide police on duty at Wapping with riot equipment; and if the equipment available includes CS gas, smoke and plastic bullets.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Police officers at Wapping have been provided with the usual protective equipment. Plastic baton rounds and CS have not been made available.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will detail the number of injuries sustained by the Metropolitan police during the News International dispute; and if he will list those injured on a monthly basis and the injuries sustained.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Commissioner informs me that up to 9 January, 410 police officers had sustained injuries. The injuries ranged from concussion and cuts and bruises to burns and broken limbs. More detailed information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disportionate cost.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will provide details on the total number of police deployed at the News International plant since the dispute began;

(2) if he will list the number of police officers provided by the Metropolitan and City police forces to police the News International plant at Wapping on a daily basis for each month since February 1986 to date.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The number of Metropolitan police officers deployed at the News International plant varies from day to day and hour to hour depending on the public order situation. I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that up to and including 31 December 1986 nearly 1·2 million police man hours had been spent by the Metropolitan police in connection with the dispute. Although City of London officers police marches by print workers which pass through the city they are not regularly deployed outside the News International plant itself.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will detail the number of injuries by civilians during the News International dispute; and if he will list those injured on a monthly basis and the injuries sustained.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that this information is not available. Such injuries are not necessarily reported to the police.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will outline the mutual aid arrangements established across the Metropolitan police district to ensure that the operational requirements for police cover have been met during the News International dispute at Wapping;

(2) if he will list the Metropolitan police divisions which have sent officers to Wapping; and what were the numbers of officers sent on each occasion.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that officers from all eight areas in the Metropolitan police district have been deployed in connection with policing the News International dispute. The numbers provided by a particular area on a particular occasion depend on the requirement at Wapping, and other policing requirements elsewhere in the Metropolitan police district. Rest day working and other overtime are options available to senior officers to ensure that operational requirements are met. Records of the number of officers provided by each area or division are not kept centrally, and this information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide details of the mutual aid arrangements made with forces outside London to ensure the operational requirements of policing the News International plant at Wapping have been met.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that he has not requested any such aid.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will detail the daily cost of policing the Wapping News International dispute in overtime payments; and if he will provide a total cost of overtime necessitated by the dispute.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the daily cost in overtime payments of policing the News International dispute is not available. The total cost of police overtime up to the end of November is estimated at about £4·6 million.

New Prison, Wrexham

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what permanent new employment he expects to be created as a result of his plans to build a new prison at Wrexham; and if he will make a statement;

(2) on what days he first informed Wrexham Maelor borough council and Clwyd county council of his intention to build a category C closed prison for about 600 inmates at Wrexham;

(3) whether he will consider plans for building a smaller prison at Wrexham than at present suggested;

(4) if he is prepared to consider, for the new prison, sites in addition to the one at present under examination at Wrexham, if any are found to be available and generally acceptable.

Mr. Mellor: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Dogs (Working Party)

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the report of the working party set up to consider the findings of the removal of canine faeces projects carried out by the London borough of Barking and Dagenham, the borough of Gosport, the north-west Leicestershire district council and the Rochester upon Medway city council; and whether he intends to offer an extension of the bye-law to other areas.

Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received the report on the experimental schemes allowing six local authorities powers to deal with the problem of dog-fouling; and when it will be published.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have received this report and, as I stated in replies which I gave to questions by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) at columns 554-558 on 17 December 1986, we are considering whether the results of the experimental scheme provide a sufficient basis on which to make the bye-laws available for adoption by other local authorities, and expect shortly to announce the conclusions we have reached. The publication of the report will coincide with this announcement.

Nuclear Weapons Convoys

Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends to issue new guidance on the movement of nuclear weapons convoys to chief fire officers.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: It has been the long standing policy of this and previous Governments not to comment on methods of transporting nuclear weapons. However, there is continuing liaison between the representatives of chief fire officers and Ministry of Defence staff about the role of the fire service in the handling of incidents involving radioactive materials and guidance to chief fire officers is kept under review.

Police Officers (fatalities)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers were killed on duty in 1978 and each year since.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The number of police officers killed on duty in England and Wales since 1978 is as follows:

	Number
1978	14
1979	10
1980	5
1981	10
1982	13
1983	16
1984	15
1985	7
1986	9

Crime Prevention

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the agencies to be involved in a multi-agency effort to deter and combat crime.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We already actively encourage all agencies and organisations in the public, private and voluntary sectors to identify ways in which they can help to prevent crime. A vast range of projects and initiatives have been introduced or are planned which involve a number of agencies or organisations combining their knowledge, expertise and resources to undertake specific crime prevention activity at national and local level. A good example is our five local demonstration projects where the local authorities, police, probation, local companies and other local agencies, including voluntary groups have adopted a multi-agency approach to crime prevention in their communities.

Community/Police Consultative Group

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the reasons for writing to the Community/Police consultative group for Lambeth on 23 September to say that the Government have allowed the Metropolitan Police (Compensation) Act 1886 to remain on the statute book even though the Government no longer accept the principles upon which it is based; and if he will specify the principles with which his Department disagrees.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 734]: I assume the hon. Member is referring to the Riot (Damages) Act 1886. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary wrote to the chairman of the Lambeth consultative group in reply to a letter from her enclosing a copy of the group's report on the disorders in Brixton in September 1985. The report contained proposals for amending the 1886 Act. The Act is based on the assumption that riots are the result of a failure to provide adequate policing and that those who suffer damage to their premises or property in the course of a riot should therefore be entitled to compensation from the police fund for the area. As my right hon. Friend's letter explained, we no longer accept these assumptions but have retained the Act because it provides help to small businesses and households in inner city areas which may be vulnerable to riots.

Rule 43

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number and proportion of prisoners held on rule 43 in the Prison Department's south-east region at the end of October in 1976, 1985 and 1986 respectively.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 734-5]: Figures for 1976 are not available. The information requested for the years 1985-86 is as follows:

Date	Good Order and Discipline (note 1)		Own Protection (note 2)
	Number	Per cent. of south east Region population	Number	Per cent. of south east Region population
31 October 1985	37	0·4	218	2·5
31 October 1986	50	0·5	332	3·8

Note 1: These figures exclude women and inmates of youth custody and detention centres for whom figures are not available.
Note 2: These figures exclude women and inmates of youth custody and detention centres and unconvicted prisoners, for whom figures are not available.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Peter Wright (Trial Costs)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General, pursuant to the answer of 12 January, Official Report, column 16, concerning the cost of the Peter Wright case in Australia, if he will give a breakdown of the total cost between (i) travel and subsistence of witnesses, (ii) fees to counsel, (iii) fees to solicitors and (iv) other legal expenses.

The Attorney-General: I shall break down the total cost to public funds to date of the court action in Australia into two categories: the first, travelling and subsistence for officials, is approximately £55,000; the second, legal fees, is approximately £115,000.

TRANSPORT

Flying (Environmental Impact)

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to ensure that small airfield companies, such as flying clubs, gliding, microlights and parachute clubs, take account of the environmental impact of their activities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: No. I am satisfied that the current legislation gives me adequate powers to take account of the environmental impact of operations at small airfields.

Car Count (Modbury-Bigbury)

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people are involved in the car count on the Modbury to Bigbury road; and at what cost to the taxpayer each year.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: On the average, two casual enumerators at £2,100 per annum.

M5 (Lane Closure)

Mr. Macfarlane asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will name the contractor who closed a mile-long section of the M5 on the inner lane of the southbound carriageway immediately before Taunton Deane motorway service area on Sunday 4 January; and if he will investigate why no work was being conducted within that sector.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The lane closure was introduced during Sunday afternoon by Somerset county council to enable essential maintenance work to start early on Monday 5 January. Operations of this nature are best carried out during daylight hours when traffic is at its lightest and lane closure introduced with the minimum disruption to the travelling public.

British Airways

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the total amount of money spent and committed for spending by his Department and by British Airways in preparation for the sale of British Airways, showing separately how much has been spent on advertising.

Mr. Moore: As is customary, I shall publish the full details of the costs associated with British Airways privatisation after the flotation has been completed. Advertising costs, in particular, can be subject to last minute changes which would make it inappropriate to publish estimates now.

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the foreign states in which a media campaign has been launched to aid the sale of British Airways, showing the amount in pounds sterling committed in each country.

Mr. Moore: No media campaign has been or will be launched in any foreign state to aid the sale of British Airways.

Aircraft Noise

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the positions and functions of those members of staff of his Department who are contributing to the work of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation committee on the challenges of modern society pilot study on aircraft noise in a modern society.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My Department has contributed in the past to this study but is not actively involved at the present.

M1-M6 Interchange

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now take steps to introduce full lighting and fog detectors at the M1-M6 interchange junction 19.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There are no immediate plans to light junction 19, which has a relatively good accident record, but the situation is under review.

There are also no plans to provide fog detection equipment at junction 19. As announced on 29 October, trials of differing designs of fog detection equipment will be carried out over this winter and next winter to decide which design best meets the Department's requirements. The new system will then be installed at the 30 fog prone sites on the M25 identified by the Meteorological Office. The work is due for completion in 1990. The effectiveness of the system will be monitored to determine whether it should be used on other motorways.

The ultimate responsibility for safety in fog rests with the drivers themselves.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will call for a report from the chief constable on the circumstances surrounding the accident on the southbound carriageway of the M1/M6 at junction 19 on Thursday 8 January.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Officials are in regular contact with the Leicestershire police at senior and operational level and will together consider what can be learned from the unfortunate series of accidents and if any steps can be taken to reduce the possibility of a repetition.

Ticket Fraud

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what instructions are given to British Transport police with regard to the detection and prevention of ticket fraud; and what is the nature of their relationship in this work with London Regional Transport staff.

Mr. David Mitchell: It is the function of the British Transport police to protect both the general public using the Underground and London Underground staff from crime and th effects of crime. It is also their function to protect and safeguard London Underground's property. They have a duty to assist in the detection and prevention of any offence against the law or against the railway byelaws, including ticket fraud. It will not normally be necessary for staff to seek the assistance of the British Transport police in order to deal with minor offences of fare evasion, but the police may be called upon by London Underground management by individual members of staff if they believe that assistance is needed, for instance where they believe that there is a risk of violence directed against staff.

Underground (Ticket Checks)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport under what authority British Transport police are undertaking checks at Pimlico and Brixton underground stations on tickets; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: British Transport police officers have not been engaged in checking tickets. The checks referred to have been undertaken by travelling ticket inspectors employed by London Underground Limited during operations to clamp down on fare evasion on this part of the Victoria line. Police have been present in order to reduce the risk of assault on staff carrying out these ticket checks.

Drinking and Driving

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he has any plans to introduce mandatory warning labels against drinking and driving on all alcohol containers;

(2) if he has any plans to introduce mandatory signs or posters in premises where intoxicating liquor is sold concerning the dangers of drinking and driving.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I believe the drinks trade is aware of the major contribution it can make in the battle against drinking and driving. A number of useful initiatives have been taken by the trade, one of which involved the circulation of new publicity material for use on licensed premises. I am keen to explore with the trade how its role can be developed further. We have no plans for action on a mandatory basis.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Trade Descriptions Act 1972

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he anticipates bringing forward legislation to repeal the Trade Descriptions Act 1972 and replacing it with a new measure further to protect the consumer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: Provision for repeal of the 1972 Act is made in the Consumer Protection Bill which is currently being considered in another place. It is the Government's intention that the entry into force of the repeal of the Act should coincide with that of any order providing for successor arrangements so that there will be no intervening period when no regime applies.

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received regarding the Government's intention of seeking repeal of the Trade Descriptions Act 1972.

Mr. Howard: I have received representations from a number of hon. Members and from some trade associations and local authorities.

Time Share Agencies

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions have taken place recently between the Government and representatives of time share agencies regarding the possible need for increased consumer protection and greater regulation of the industry.

Mr. Howard: I have exchanged correspondence and held meetings with representatives of time share developers. My Department has also held several such meetings. These discussions have covered both the current situation in the industry and the consumer advice leaflet which my Department will be issuing shortly.

Aid to Industry

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of Stae for Trade and Industry how much has been spent in each year by the Government since 1983 on regional aid to industry to each of the English regions, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland; and through which agencies this finance was spent.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Figures for calendar years are not readily available, and expenditure is shown for financial years from 1983-84:

Expenditure[1] at Current Prices

£ million

Region	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86[2]
Northern	127·5	122·2	94·4
North West	101·4	101·6	85·9
Yorkshire & Humberside	35·5	41·9	34·3
East Midlands	17·6	10·1	8·3
West Midlands	—	—	5·5
South West	11·9	13·7	11·8
Scotland	222·4	184·5	204·7
Wales	113·5	141·1	132·1
Great Britain[3]	629·8	615·0	577·0
Northern Ireland	103·0	129·1	145·5
United Kingdom	732·8	745·1	722·5

Notes:

[1] All figures are gross and include payments to nationalised industries.

[2] The Great Britain total does not always equal the sum of the component parts due to rounding.

[3] Figures for 1985-86 are provisional estimates.

The agencies through which this expenditure was spent are as follows:

English Regions

The Department of Trade and Industry and the English Industrial Estates Corporation.

Scotland

The Scottish Office (Industry Department for Scotland), the Scottish Development Agency, the Highlands and Islands Development Board and the Department of Trade and Industry.

Wales

The Welsh Office (Industry Department), the Welsh Development Agency, the Development Board for Rural Wales and the Department of Trade and Industry.

Northern Ireland

The Northern Ireland Department of Economic Development and the Industrial Development Board.

The items included in the expenditure are regional development grants and regional selective assistance under the Industrial Development Act 1982, and expenditure on land and factories by the English Industrial Estates Corporation, the Scottish and Welsh Development Agencies, the Development Board for Rural Wales, and the Highlands and Islands Development Board. Northern Ireland has a different range of financial incentives available and the items included in the expenditure have been restricted to aids similar to the main forms of regional preferential assistance; these are selective financial assistance payable under part III of the Industries Development (NI) Order 1982, general assistance (capital) grants payable under part IV of the order, and land and factories expenditure.

Petrol Prices

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Office of Fair Trading last investigated petrol prices; and when it next intends to do so.

Mr. Howard: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Manufacturing Output

Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the most recent figure for the index of output in manufacturing industry; and what was the comparable figure six, seven and eight years ago.

Mr. Butcher: The information requested is given in the table.

Index of output of the manufacturing industries (1980 = 100)

October
1978	108
1979	108
1980	94
1986	106

BTR-Pilkington

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects the Office of Fair Trading to complete its consideration of the BTR bid for Pilkington.

Mr. Howard: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Science and Technology

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent steps he has taken to strengthen the knowledge and skills of the United Kingdom in science and technology.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend announced on 6 November that the recurrent grant to universities for 1987-88 will go up by £95 million compared with the grant for 1986-87, an increase of over 7 per cent. and that equipment grant will go up by £6.5 million, an increase of over 6 per cent. This extra money will allow the universities to continue as the main providers of basic scientific research. In addition the science budget for 1987-88 will be £39 million more than in 1986-87, an increase of 6.3 per cent. Since the Government took office in 1979 the science budget has increased by 10.6 per cent. over the rate of general inflation.

My right hon. Friend has also undertaken a number of measures to promote awareness of and competence in science, mathematics and technology across the whole range of educational provision. For a description of these I refer my hon. Friend to the Department's written evidence to the House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology on 4 June 1986 (House of Lords Minutes of Evidence (71-xiv) page 385).

My right hon. Friend's proposals to establish a network of city technical colleges are also designated to strengthen the teaching of science and technology throughout the school stytem.

School Sizes

Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science on what research evidence his Department bases its guidelines for minimum school sizes, as outlined in the White Paper, "Better Schools."

Mr. Dunn: The White paper, "Better Schools", gives a general indication of the size thresholds at which schools of different types can deliver a satisfactory curriculum economically. This is based on curriculum modelling and on evidence from inspections of schools by Her Majesty's inspectorate.

Dr. J. G. Beaumont

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth may receive a definitive reply to his letters of 29 September and 4 December 1986 which refer to Dr. J. G. Beaumont.

Mr. Bob Dunn: I replied to my hon. Friend on 13 January.

AIDS

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the occasions on which the Medical Research Council has sought funding for research on AIDS since 1983; and what was the outcome in each case.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply of 18 December 1986 to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) at columns 666-67.

The Medical Research Council has supported research on AIDS from within its science budget allocation since 1983. They have sought additional funding for this research on two occasions.

In 1985 the council sought £0·5 million a year from 1986-87 to fund an epidemiological research centre to monitor the spread of AIDS in the United Kingdom. The greater part of the cost (£0·3 million) was met by a contribution from the health departments. The council met the remaining £0·2 million from its science budget allocation for 1986-87 onwards (which included £2.5 million new money).

Sacred Heart Primary School, London

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) why he has refused financial approval for the years 1987-88 for the replacement of Sacred Heart primary school in Trott street, Battersea, London; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when he plans to reply to the letter of 8 December 1986 from the hon. Member for Battersea concerning Sacred Heart primary school, Trott street, Battersea, London.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Resources for grant-aiding governors' expenditure at aided and special agreement schools, such as Sacred Heart, are limited. Priority is given to projects which provide extra places in areas where there is an overall shortage of places or which take out of use surplus places. Beyond that, it was possible this year to allocate funding to a very small number of the most urgent improvement projects. Sacred Heart was not one of these.

A reply to the hon. Member's letter of 8 December will be sent as soon as possible.

ENERGY

Electricity Supplies (Channel Cable Link)

Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list, on a monthly basis, the amount of electricity supplied to the Central Electricity Generating Board grid system from France via the Channel cable link since its inception to November 1986.

Mr. Goodlad: The figures are published in table 1 of my Department's publication "Energy Trends".

Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list, on a monthly basis, the amount of electricity supplied to France from the Central Electricity Generating Board grid system via the Channel cable link since its inception to November 1986.

Mr. Goodlad: None.

Coal Imports

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy from which countries coal has been imported during the last 12 months; and what information he has in each case as to the extent to which the United Kingdom price of that coal properly reflects the cost of production, marketing and distribution.

Mr. David Hunt: In the past 12 months coal has been imported from Australia, the United States, Poland, South Africa, West Germany, Canada, the Netherlands, Belgium and Colombia. Information on how the delivered price is calculated is not available.

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) further to his reply to the hon. Member for Rother Valley on 18 December, Official Report, column 621, concerning emergency arrangements at nuclear power stations, what is the statutory requirement for emergency arrangements to be rehearsed regularly; what is the typical number of inspectors present during the annual exercise at each location; whether any full-scale exercises have been undertaken in recent years other than those witnessed by Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate; whether he has any plans to review the content or frequency of exercises of emergency arrangements; and if he will make a statement;

(2) further to his replies to the hon. Member for Rother Valley on 27 November 1986, Official Report, column 302, and 18 December 1986, Official Report, column 621, concerning duly authorised persons and exercises of emergency arrangements at nuclear power stations, what proportion of duly authorised persons at a typical station is associated with each separate shift; what arrangements are made for newly appointed duly authorised persons to participate in annual exercises witnessed by Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate in the first year of appointment; with what frequency a duly authorised person participates in such annual exercises; what proportion of annual exercise scenarios include rehearsal of off-site measures to protect the public; with what frequency each manager or deputy manager participates in exercises of off-site measures to protect the public; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Coal Production

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the present production of the coalfields in view of recent fires at two pits and the consequences for production in Scotland and Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker: This is a matter for British Coal, and I shall ask the chairman to write.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

United Kingdom Elections

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what provision he has made for information to be available in local languages at United Kingdom missions abroad on how to vote in United Kingdom elections.

Mr. Eggar: None except in France where newspaper advertisements in English have been accompanied by a French translation as required by French law.

Lie Detectors (GCHQ)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the operation of polygraph lie detectors at Government communications headquarters.

Mrs. Chalker: The first phase of the polygraph pilot scheme undertaken following the recommendations of the Security Commission in its report on the case of Geoffrey Prime (Cmnd. 8876) has been completed. This included the examination of staff of the Security Service and of senior members of GCHQ.

It has been decided to commission some further independent research into the validity of the polygraph. No decision has yet been taken on the starting date for the 2nd phase of the pilot scheme, which would include the testing of a random sample of the staff of GCHQ.

Government Department (Trade Unions)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to extend the ban on trade unions from the Government communications headquarters to other parts of his Department.

Mrs. Chalker: It is not our intention to extend the measures introduced at the Government communications headquarters beyond those agencies whose primary functions are concerned with security and intelligence.

Lie Detector Tests

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to introduce polygraph lie detector tests in parts of his Department in addition to the Government communications headquarters.

Mrs. Chalker: We have no such plans.

Rape Trial (Perpignan)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, having regard to the conduct of the British honorary consul in Perpignan and others, he will provide funds for the representation by senior and junior counsel of the two British complainants as co-prosecutors in the trial for raping them of Marc Diaz and Frank Noguera, and for the prompt payment to them of an ex gratia payment in lieu of criminal injuries compensation; if he will provide further funds for the same complainants as co-prosecutors of Mr. Paul Kutner; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Successive Governments have confirmed that public funds are not available to assist those engaging in legal proceedings abroad. Complainants must seek legal advice on the availability or otherwise of legal aid in the country concerned. Awards under the criminal injuries compensation scheme are made on an ex gratia basis and apply only to cases arising in Great Britain or on British registered ships or aeroplanes. Charges against Mr. Kutner in the United Kingdom have not been pursued and he has not been charged in France.

Gibraltar

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of his discussions on Gibraltar with the Spanish Foreign Minister on 13 and 14 January.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As provided for in the Brussels agreement of November 1984, the Spanish Foreign Minister and I held a full discussion of differences between our two Governments over Gibraltar, including the issues of sovereignty, as well as ways of promoting co-operation between Gibraltar and Spain. The discussions were held in a positive, friendly spirit as befits two EC partners and NATO allies.

Argentina

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the talks in the United States of America between United Kingdom and Argentinian officials began; what rank of officials are representing the United Kingdom; on what basis the talks are being held; what is the role of the United States Administration; what other countries are involved; what subjects are being discussed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: There have been no such talks.

Mr. Rajendra Ramasamy

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the hon. Member for Newham, North-West can expect a reply to his letter regarding Mr. Rajendra Ramasamy sent to the Home Office on 4 November 1986 and passed on to the Foreign Office on 9 December 1986; and when Mr. Ramasamy can expect to receive his student visa.

Mr. Eggar: Mr. Ramasamy's application is still being considered. I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Kenya (AIDS)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice is given by the High Commission in Nairobi to British visitors to Kenya concerning the risk of AIDS in various parts of Kenya.

Mr. Eggar: Advice for British nationals travelling anywhere overseas on AIDS or other infectious and communicable diseases is contained in the pamphlet SA35/1987, "Protect Your Health Abroad", published by the Department of Health and Social Security and freely available from travel agents.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authorities (Vacant Land)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) in which areas it is compulsory for local authorities to register vacant land held by them on the public land register;

(2) in which areas it is not compulsory for local authorities to register vacant land held by them on the public land register; and what steps he proposes to take to make this procedure compulsory.

Mr. John Patten: Part X of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 has been brought into operation throughout England. No English local authorities are exempt from its provisions.

London Docklands

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will hold an inquiry into planning applications made by the London Docklands Development Corporation in respect of the royal docks and West Ferry Circus.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend expects to issue shortly his decision on whether or not to call in the planning application for West Ferry Circus that has been submitted to him as a departure from the development plan. There are no applications with the corporation at present to develop land in and around the Royal Victoria, Royal Albert and King George V docks.

Commission for the New Towns

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the present status of New Town Commission tenants; and what decisions have been reached concerning their future landlords.

Mr. John Patten: Tenants of the Commission for the New Towns at Basildon have exactly the same status as regards security of tenure and the right to buy as they had before the wind-up of the Basildon development corporation last year. No decision has been taken about the future ownership of the new town housing at Basildon, and none will be until the tenants have been fully consulted.

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the disposal of the New Town Commission's assets.

Mr. John Patten: The purposes for which the Commission for the New Towns exists are set out in section 36 of the New Towns Act 1981 (as amended by the New Towns and Urban Development Corporations Act 1985) and include the disposal, as soon as it considers expedient to do so, of property transferred to it from former development corporations and any other property held by it. By virtue of section 37 of the 1981 Act (as amended) the commission may not, other than with the general or special authority of the Secretary of State, dispose of any property by way of gift or for a consideration less than the best reasonably obtainable.

Housing Finance

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report for each local authority in England (a) the housing investment bid submitted for 1986-87, (b) the allocation announced, (c) the allocation as a percentage of the bid in each case and (d) the 1986-87 allocation in each case.

Mr. Tracey: A table showing this information in the form requested is being prepared and will be placed in the Library shortly.

Building Research Establishment

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will bring up to date the table of staffing of the Building Research Establishment given in the reply by the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) on 11 June 1984; what is the current shortfall of staff in post compared with the authorised complement (a) overall and (b) in the science category; and what is the proposed complement for 1987-88.

Mr. John Patten: The manpower allocation for the Building Research Establishment was 771 for 1 April 1986. There were 755 staff in post on 1 April 1986. On that date there were (a) overall 16 fewer staff than allowed for in the complement and (b) in the science category six fewer staff than in the complement.

The manpower allocation for the Building Research Establishment is 751 for 1 April 1987. There were 742½ staff in post on 1 December 1986. On that date there were (a) overall eight and a half less staff than allowed for in the 1 April 1987 allocation and (b) in the science category five and a half more staff. The detailed figures are in the table.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the current level of morale, performance and scientific output at the Building Research Establishment; and what proposals he has for the long-term future of this organisation.

Mr. John Patten: The performance and scientific output, which are the best measures of morale at the Building Research Establishment, remain high (in quality and content), as can be judged from the recent annual report (1985-86), a copy of which has been placed in the House of Commons Library. The establishment has been the subject of a recent study by Sir Henry Chilver and Sir Peter Harrop, which is being considered.

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the Building Research Establishment to complete the investigation into the Reema type of prefabricated reinforced concrete houses.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1987]: The Building Research Establishment's report on Reema hollow panel system houses (now designated under the housing defects legislation) was published in December 1984, and a copy is in the Library. The BRE's investigations of later, different forms of Reema construction will be covered in its report on large panel buildings generally, likely to be available early this summer.

Princes Risborough Laboratory

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on progress to date in transferring the facilities of the Princes Risborough laboratory to the main Building Research Establishment site at Garston; what financial and staffing resources were allocated for timber research in each of the years 1984-85, 1985-86 and 1986-87; and how the allocations compared with the actual outturn.

Mr. John Patten: Arrangements for the transfer of research facilities of the Princes Risborough laboratory to the main site at Garston are proceeding satisfactorily; transfer should be completed by the end of 1987.

Allocations of direct BRE research staff to timber research in 1984-85, 1985-86, 1986-87 were 37, 36 and 33·2 respectively, while outturns were 32·4 in 1984-85, 35·9 in 1985-86 and are estimated as 32·6 in 1986-87. At full economic cost, BRE's outturn expenditure, including in-house work and that carried out externally, in 1984-85, 1985-86, 1986-87 was £1,781,131, £2,086,951 and £1,943,625 (estimated) respectively.

Previous answers given to similar questions were given in Supply Vote terms.

Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive

Sir Patrick Wall asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what exchanges on environmental issues occur between his Department and the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department and NIREX discuss as necessary issues of common interest, including environmental ones in pursuit of the Government's published policy on radioactive waste disposal.

Camber Castle

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the reasons for the delay in the opening of Camber castle at Rye to the public; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Camber castle is one of the many ancient monuments which are now managed on my right hon. Friend's behalf by the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission. I understand that it has been undergoing repairs. It is for the commission to decide how much of the castle can be opened to the public and how soon. My hon. Friend may therefore wish to take this up with the chairman, Lord Montagu of Beaulieu.

Land Use

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a Green Paper setting out his objectives and policies for long-term change in strategic planning of rural land use, with specific reference to related factors including the cost and quality of rural transport.

Mr. Tracey: I published on 15 September 1986 a consultation paper on the future of development plans. Inter alia, this referred to the arrangements for development planning in rural areas.

Sandwell (House Repairs)

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider the allocation of extra funds to the Sandwell metropolitan borough council under the rate support grant settlement for housing repairs under the Housing Defects Act and subsequent amendment.

Mr. Tracey: The rate support grant is an unhypothecated grant and would therefore be an inappropriate tool for taking account of expenditure by a particular authority on housing repairs.

Aircraft Noise

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will place in the Library a copy of the report of the pilot study on aircraft noise in a modern society to the recent annual meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation committee on the challenges of modern society;

(2) if he will make a statement on the progress and future activities of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation committee on the challenges of modern society pilot study on aircraft noise in a modern society.

Mr. Waldegrave: The pilot study on aircraft noise in modern society has not yet completed its report. I understand that it aims to complete an interim summary report before the May plenary of the committee itself, but that the final report will not be ready for some considerable time. I shall arrange for a copy of the interim report to be placed in the Library when it is published.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Enviroment if he will list the positions and functions of those members of staff at his Department who are contributing to the work of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation committee on the challenges of modern society pilot study on aircraft noise in a modern society.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department is not directly involved in the work of this pilot study. The United Kingdom's contribution to it is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. My Department is represented usually at grade 7 level on the committee itself, which oversees the work of all pilot studies.

Leeds (Urban Programme)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state the grounds on which he rejected applications under the urban programme from the Ley Lane Tenants Association and the Broadlea Residents' Action Group, Leeds.

Mr. John Patten: Both these projects were approved on 23 December.

Derelict Urban Areas

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will authorise additional funding to attract private sector interests to participate in approved private-public partnership schemes for the regeneration of derelict urban areas.

Mr. John Patten: The Government's plans for public expenditure on urban regeneration, including support by the way of urban development grant and urban regeneration grant for schemes undertaken by the private sector, are set out in the White Paper on public expenditure which was published yesterday.

Urban Development Corporations

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of the four new urban development corporations; when they will be set up; when they will start work; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: An order designating the first of the four proposed urban development corporations, the Trafford Park development corporation, was laid before Parliament on 15 December 1986. My right hon. Friend has appointed consultants to advise him about the other three; for the Black Country, Teeside and Tyne and Wear, and will make the necessary orders as soon as possible after receiving their reports.

London Residuary Body

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many days each of the part-time members of the London Residuary Body have worked since their appointment; and what has been the total remuneration paid to each one.

Mr. Chope: The relevant terms of appointment of each part time member of the London Residuary body are as follows:

Member	Days per week	Rate of Remuneration (from 1 July 1986) £ per annum
A Blakemore, CBE	2	12,492
J Esling	4	24,984
W J M MacKenzie, OBE	2	12,492
M C Roberts	3	18,738
J Wolkind, CBE	2	12,492
Councillor Sir Peter Bowness	1	6,246

Within these terms of appointment, the day-to-day organisation of work and the method of remuneration are matters for the residuary body. My right hon. Friend has no information on the first part of the hon. Member's question.

Redditch Borough Council

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to reply to the submission from Redditch borough council in respect of housing issues which was made on 27 November 1986.

Mr. John Patten: I hope to be in a position to reply to the chief executive officer, borough of Redditch within the next few days.

Defective Housing

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities have received special loan sanctions to re-purchase defective housing in advance of reinstatement schemes being available.

Mr. John Patten: Under the housing defects legislation local authorities decide whether to repurchase, or provide grant for reinstatement, in accordance with the rules laid down in the legislation. They do not need my Department's approval for the exercise of the judgment the law requires of them. Nor do they need special loan sanction to enable them to finance their decisions.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities have drawn his attention to problems with roof trusses on dwellings constructed between 1965 to 1975; and what has been his response.

Mr. John Patten: The only local authority which has made representations to me on this subject is the borough of Redditch, to which I shall be replying shortly.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many staff were employed by his Department in 1979 and for each subsequent year; what estimates have been made on the effect of changes in staff numbers upon the efficiency of his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: The number of staff employed by the Department of the Environment (Central) since April 1979 is:

	Number
1 April 1979	12,358
1 April 1980	11,654
1 April 1981	10,962
1 April 1982	8,802
1 April 1983	7,813
1 April 1984	6,605
1 April 1985	6,561
1 April 1986	6,521

The overall reduction of 5,837 (47 per cent.) between 1 April 1979 and 1 April 1986 has been achieved by a number of means:

		Per cent.
Hiving off	1,698	29
Privatisation	255	4
Contracting out	338	6
Transfers to other departments	1,141	20
Other savings	2,405	41
	5,837	100

The 2,405 "other savings" reflect a sustained drive to reduce costs and improve efficiency.

Chief Radiochemical Inspector

Mrs. Roe asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to receive the annual report of the Chief Radiochemical Inspector.

Mr. Waldegrave: I received the second annual report of Her Majesty's Radiochemical Inspectorate from the Chief Radiochemical Inspector today. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

Inner London Education Authority

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he proposes to take to bring the Inner London education authority in line with other local authorities by making its members subject to disqualification following surcharge and audit action.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend has today laid before the House an order under section 101 of the Local Government Act 1985 which will extend audit related disqualification provisions to the members of the Inner London education authority, thus bringing it into line with elected representatives in all other local authorities. The order will provide for ILEA members themselves to be disqualified following audit action, and will also apply disqualification to any disqualified persons who at any future date seek election to the Inner London education authority.

any persons who become disqualified in future, even if as a result of actions taken before the date of this order.

any persons disqualified as a result of action taken after the date of this order.

It will not disqualify members of the authority by reason of certificate issued against them before the order comes into operation until such time as they cease to be members of the authority.

The order also includes two minor unrelated, miscellaneous provisions.

Rates

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about regional variations in levels of rates, and especially between London boroughs and county councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope [pursuant to his reply 12 January 1987, c. 37]: Comparisons of rate poundages between London and the rest of the country are complicated by the special arrangements for the payment of block grant in London and by the separate London resource equalisation scheme. Average rate poundages in London at 168p are therefore lower than the average rate poundage in the non-metropolitan areas—211p. Average domestic rate bills in London are, however, higher at £485 than in the non-metropolitan areas — £377 — because of the higher rateable values in London. The Government do not accept that it is sensible to expect ratepayers in different parts of the country to pay widely different prices for equivalent levels of local services. Our proposals for a community charge will remove this anomaly.

For business ratepayers, large and unpredictable changes in rate bills from year to year, unrelated to the value of services provided, may be more damaging than the absolute level of rate payments. Our proposals for a uniform business rate poundage, linked to inflation, will allow businesses to plan with more confidence.

PRIME MINISTER

Mid-Kent Constituency

Q101. Mr. Rowe asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to pay on official visit to the Mid-Kent constituency.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

State Security

Q124. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to her answer of 4 December, Official Report, column 728, why she will not establish an inquiry into allegations that members of the security services conducted surveillance on Government Ministers in the 1970s under the code name Oatsheaf; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary during the debate on 3 December 1986 at column 959.

Engagements

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 January.

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 January.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 January.

Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 January.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 January.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Lie Detectors (GCHQ)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if there has been any change in Her Majesty's Government's policy on the use of lie detectors at Government communications headquarters, Cheltenham.

The Prime Minister: No. I refer the hon. Member to the reply he received today from the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Universities

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister whether it was with her authority that Mr. Tony Fairclough, chief scientific administrator at the Cabinet Office, advocated making a few universities internationally competitive as centres of excellence in selected areas of sciences; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: In advocating greater selectivity and concentration of resources for scientific research in higher education, Mr. Fairclough was fairly representing the view of the Government that there needs to be greater concentration and selectivity of research activities in order to strengthen international competitiveness and make the most effective use of resources. The University Grants Committee, with the encouragement of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science, is already implementing a more selective policy for research funding in the universities.

Government Communications Centre

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister when the new Government communications centre in Whitehall will be completed.

The Prime Minister: There is no centre of the type described in the question.

The Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency (CCTA) is undertaking a number of enhancements to their telecommunications network, spread over a five year period.

The Whitehall central branch exchange (CBX) modernisation is in the second phase of the relevant five year plan. Eight new CBX area exchanges are being introduced between 1985 and 1990.

A large tandem exchange, the London tandem, is used to support the Government telephone network (GTN) and the CBX. This exchange will also be modernised with replacements in two stages, which are planned for 27 July and 23 November this year.

Inner Cities

Mr. Freeson asked the Prime Minister if she will describe the duties of the Department of the Environment and the Department of Employment relating to the implementation of Government policies concerned with the regeneration of the inner cities.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has responsibility for the inter-departmental urban programme which targets specific grant resources on urban areas to support a range of initiatives to stimulate enterprise, improve the environment and encourage self-help. He also has responsibility for other programmes and initiatives which aim to attract private investment and regenerate hard-pressed urban areas, including urban development corporations, urban development grant, derelict land grant and the new urban regeneration grant, and "Estate Action", an initiative to tackle the problems of urban housing estates.

My noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment oversees the work of the five city action teams in the inner city partnership areas to improve the contribution of relevant Government programmes, including those of his Department and the Manpower Services Commission, Department of Trade and Industry and the Department of the Environment to meet the Government's urban policy objectives. In addition, my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General and Minister for Employment is responsible for an inter-departmental inner city initiative involving eight task forces promoting enterprise and employment opportunities at neighbourhood level.

Alcohol (Expenditure)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Prime Minister what estimate can be made of the annual total expenditure on alcohol in the United Kingdom.

The Prime Minister: Consumer expenditure on alcoholic drink in the United Kingdom was estimated to be £15·8 billion in 1985.

Nationalised Industries

Miss Maynard asked the Prime Minister what rules govern the acceptance of paid consultancies by chairmen of nationalised industries.

The Prime Minister: The chairmen of nationalised industries are subject to the terms and conditions laid down in their letters of appointment. In general, acceptance of any outside appointment needs to be approved by the Secretary of State of the sponsor Department concerned, who must be satisfied that the chairman will continue to give sufficient time to his duties with the board, and that there is no conflict of interest. In the case of some nationalised industries, the Secretary of State is required by statute to satisfy himself from time to time that the chairman has no such financial or other interest as is likely to affect prejudicially the exercise and performance of his functions as a board member.

SCOTLAND

Teachers

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the current situation as regards teachers in Scottish schools.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) and to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) by my right hon. and learned Friend on Wednesday 14 January 1987.

Ministers (Factory Opening Ceremonies)

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all of the factory opening ceremonies at which Scottish Office Ministers have been present in their official capacity since 1979, with the dates of each opening ceremony.

Mr. Rifkind: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Jobs

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the numbers and percentages of jobs lost, or gained, in Scotland between June 1979 and December 1986, or the latest month for which figures are available, in (a) all industries, (b) all manufacturing industries, (c) all service industries, (d) shipbuilding and repairing, (e) metal goods, engineering and vehicles, (f) mechanical engineering, (g) electrical electronic engineering and instrument engineering, (h) health, education and person social services, (i) retail distribution and (j) banking, insurance and finance.

Mr. Rifkind: Information about job gains and losses is not available from the Department of Employment's statistics, but an indication of the net changes can be seen by comparing levels of employment at June 1979 and June 1986, the latest date for which estimates are available.

Comparable Scottish estimates of the numbers of employees in employment in the shipbuilding and repairing, mechanical engineering, electrical and electronic engineering and instrument engineering industries are not available for June 1979 or June 1986. The available information is given in the following table.

Employees in employment in Scotland: net changes between June 1979 and June 1986

1980 SIC	Industry	Net change
		Number	Per cent.
0-9	All industries and services	−216,000	−10
2-4	All manufacturing industries	−192,000	−32
6-9	All services industries	+34,000	+3
3	Metal goods, engineering and vehicles	−76,000	−30
93-99	Education, health and other services	+31,000	+8
64 65	Retail distribution	−9,000	−5
8	Banking, insurance and finance	+33,000	+27

Expenditure Programmes

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing (i) estimated outturn for 1986-87, (ii) estimated outturn for 1986-87 expressed in real terms at 1987-88 prices and (iii) planned expenditure for 1987-88 for each of the expenditure programmes within his responsibility.

Mr. Rifkind: The information on the programmes within my responsibility is as follows:

£ million

Programmes	Estimated Outturn (1986-87)[1]	Estimated Outturn 1986-87 (real terms)[2]	Planned Expenditure 1987-88[1]
Agriculture, fisheries and food	189	196	186

Local authority current expenditure not allocated to services	—	—	124[4]
Total Scottish Block[3]	7,030	7,294	7,431
Nationalised industries' EFLs	241	250	87
Total expenditure within the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Scotland[3]	7,805	8,098	7,961

[1] Figures have been taken from table 3.16 of the 1987 Public Expenditure White Paper (Cm 56).

[2] The real terms figures are the cash figures adjusted by the GDP deflator (1987-88 = 100).

[3] Figures have been rounded to the nearest £ million and therefore do not necessarily sum to the totals. Estimates of outturn are liable to change as more information becomes available.

[4] Includes £50 million earmarked for local authority current expenditure on education.

Water Fluoridation Act 1985

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken to date to implement the provisions of the Water Fluoridation Act 1985 in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: Departmental circulars were issued to the health and water authorities in Scotland in December 1985. The authorities were advised to engage in informal discussions, but not to enter any formal arrangements for fluoridation schemes until further guidance was issued by the Departments. Circulars now being prepared give detailed guidance on the implementation of the Act, including a model form of agreement between the authorities and a comprehensive code of practice on the technical aspects of fluoridation.

Agricultural Guidance and Guarantee Fund Awards

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list in the Official Report the name of each firm, or individual, in the Banff and Buchan constituency who received a European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund award for livestock in the years 1979 to 1986, showing each award and year received separately;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report the name of each firm or individual in the Banff and Buchan constituency who received a European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund award for livestock and livestock products in the years 1979 to 1986, showing each year and each award separately;

(3) if he will list in the Official Report the amount of European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund awards to individual fish processing firms in the Banff and Buchan constituency for the years 1979 to 1986, showing the amount of the award and the name of the recipient firm;

(4) if he will list in the Official Report the name of the firm and the amount of the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund award granted to meat processing firms in the Banff and Buchan constituency in the years 1979 to 1986, each year shown separately;

(5) if he will list in the Official Report the amount and names of all fishermen who have received European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund awards in the years 1979 to 1986 for newly built vessels in the Banff and Buchan constituency;

(6) if he will list in the Official Report the name of the firm, or individual, who received a European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund grant in the years 1979 to 1986 within the Banff and Buchan constituency for crops, other than cereals, showing the amount of each grant and the year received;

(7) if he will list in the Official Report the name of the firm and the amount of the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund award granted to cereal companies in the Banff and Buchan constituency in the years 1979 to 1986, showing each year separately;

(8) if he will list in the Official Report the name of the firm and the amount of the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund award granted to poultry processing firms in the Banff and Buchan consitituency for the years 1979 to 1986, showing each year separately;

(9) if he will list in the Official Report the amount and the names of all fishermen in the Banff and Buchan constituency who have received a European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund grant in the years 1979 to 1986 for modernisation or re-engining of vessels, showing each name and amount separately.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is not readily available in the form requested. As the final answer will be rather lengthy I shall write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible and arrange to place the information in the Library of the House.

Livestock Loan Scheme

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied with the current operation of the livestock loan scheme for crofters.

Mr. John MacKay: Demand for assistance under the scheme has been very low over the last 10 years and the future of the scheme is currently under review. The Highlands and Islands Development Board is better placed to offer assistance and for some time now potential applicants have been referred to that body.

WALES

Higher Education

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is able to announce his decisions on local authority higher education provision in 1987-88; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Having consulted the Welsh Joint Education Committee and the Welsh Counties Committee I have decided that the advanced further education quantum for 1987-88 should be set at £34·1 million. This represents a 10 per cent. increase between 1985-86 and 1986-87. However, I have decided that £300,000 of the quantum should be used to fund the following selective initiatives:

Development of in-service training courses to increase the supply of Welsh medium secondary school teachers;

Development of arrangements for the commercial exploitation of institutions' facilities and expertise;

Development of provision for continuing education and professional up-dating (PICKUP).

The Wales Advisory Body has agreed to invite local authority institutions to submit competitive bids under these headings and to advise me on the distribution of the £300,000.

I have received advice from WAB on the planned disposition of academic provision and the number of student places on higher education courses in local authority colleges in Wales. The WAB proposals provide for a groth of nearly 1 per cent. between estimated enrolments of 13,528 full-time equivalents in 1986-87 and target student numbers of 13,636 for 1987-88. The proposals provide for a continued emphasis to be given to courses in science, engineering and other vocational disciplines and for sub-degree and part-time provision to be protected.

The WAB has also provided advice on how the AFE quantum, net of the £300,000 for selective initiatives, should be distributed between local authorities, and I have also consulted the WJEC and the WCC about this. The proposals for distributing the quantum are related to the proposals for target student numbers for 1987-88 by institution, mode of attendance and subject; and they allow additional funding for degree and postgraduate courses. Following a review of funding for the mono-technic colleges, WAB has recommended that Dyfed and Gwynedd should continue to receive some cash protection for 1987-88 in respect of the College of Librarianship Wales and the Normal college Bangor.

I have decided to accept the WAB's advice on academic provision and student numbers and on the methodology for distributing the quantum. The local education authorities have been informed of these decisions and of their individual allocations.

Copies of a note explaining the methodology by which the AFE quantum for 1987-88 is being distributed have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

MSC Schemes

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of those taking part in the Manpower Services Commission sponsored schemes in Wales are (a) over 50 but under 60 years of age and (b) over 60 years of age.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Comprehensive information is not available in the form requested. The only information held centrally relates to the enterprise allowance scheme, on which, according to December 1986 statistics, 11·8 per cent. of participants in Wales are aged between 45 and 54 and 3·5 per cent. are aged between 55 and 65. Information relating to the ages of participants on other schemes is available only for Great Britain as a whole.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether there are any Welsh-based Manpower Services Commission schemes which operate in England.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No.

Milk Quotas

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many milk producers have left the farming industry in each of the Welsh counties since the introduction of the milk quota scheme.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The number of registered milk producers in each of the Welsh counties since March 1983 is given in the following table:

Number of registered milk producers

	1983
	March	June	September	December

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will introduce amendments to present legislation to prevent loss of milk production to Wales through sales of milk quotas.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: No.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the figures for the amount of milk quotas sold by Welsh producers to producers outside Wales, and the amount of quota bought by Welsh producers from outside Wales, and the net loss or gain of quota to Wales, since the scheme came into operation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Movement of quota in and out of Wales as recorded by the Milk Marketing Board during the period 1 April 1985 to 17 November 1986 has been as follows:

	North Wales	South Wales
In	+3·1 million litres	+2·7 million litres
Out	−4·1 million litres	−6·9 million litres
Net Loss	−1·0 million litres	−4·2 million litres
Loss as percentage of total quota	−0·2 per cent.	−0·4 per cent.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales by what means is it possible for milk quotas to be reallocated separately from the land to which it was originally attached.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Quota may be transferred separately from the land to which it is attached through a temporary reallocation by a purchaser within a production year, or as a result of quota made available through an authorised outgoers' scheme.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the decrease in production of milk in each of the Welsh counties since the introduction of the milk quota scheme.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Sales of milk off farms for each of the Welsh counties for the last three financial years have been as follows:

Milk Production (Million Litres)

	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86
Clwyd	319·3	298·8	299·0

Education

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the number of Welsh school-leavers entering full-time degree courses at university in 1986.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information in respect of school leavers in the academic year 1985-86 is not yet available. Survey results for 1984-85, however, indicate that 2,520 school leavers intended to enter full-time degree courses at universities. This figure excludes those who intended to enter full-time degree courses at polytechnics or BEd. teacher training courses.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the percentage of Welsh candidates passing three or more A-levels in 1986.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information supplied by the Welsh Joint Education Committee indicates that 28·4 per cent. of all candidates taking WJEC A-level examinations in the summer of 1986 passed three or more A-levels.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the percentage of Welsh pupils gaining grade C or above in all O-levels in 1986.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information, as supplied by the Welsh Joint Education Committee, indicates that the proportion of attainments of grade C or above in all O-level and alternative syllabus subject entries in the 1986 summer examinations was 48·6 per cent.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many Welsh students in maintained schools sat examinations in the following O-level subjects, at WJEC, in 1985: art and design, commerce, geology, German, Italian, religious studies, Welsh language, Welsh literature, engineering, Welsh 03 and general science.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information, as supplied by the Welsh Joint Education Committee is as follows:

O-level candidates[1] in maintained schools

	Number
Art and Design	11,395
Commerce	1,544
Geology	1,073
German	1,475
Italian	61
Religious Studies	748

Trawsfynydd Power Station

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a list of the estimated maximum exposures of members of the public in respect of Trawsfynydd nuclear power station, showing (a) the dose equivalent for each year of operation, expressed in millisieverts and (b) the average dose equivalent of the 10-year period ending in each recent year, expressed in millisieverts; what changes are expected to take place concerning maximum exposures of members of the public; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: (a) The data are all available in MAFF annual reports entitled "Radioactivity in Surface and Coastal Waters of the British Isles", copies of which are available in the Library of the House. The dose equivalent (m Sv) to the critical group resulting from the discharge of liquid effluent into Lake Trawsfynydd for each year of operation is as follows:

Prior to 1968	Too low to measure accurately
1968	0·2
1969	0·2
1970	0·15
1971	0·25
1972	0·3
1973	0·3
1974	0·35
1975	0·4
1976	1·05

Prior to 1968	Too low to measure accurately
1977	0·15
1978	<0·1
1979	<0·1
1980	<0·15
1981	0·55
1982	0·35
1983	0·25
1984	0·32
1985	0·21

(b) The average annual dose equivalent (m Sv) for 10-year periods (assuming the dose for 1978 and 1979 to be 0·1 m Sv each year and the dose for 1980 to be 0·15 m Sv).

1968-77	0·34
1969-78	0·33
1970-79	0·32
1971-80	0·32
1972-81	0·35
1973-82	0·35
1974-83	0·35
1975-84	0·34
1976-85	0·32

We do not expect any major change to the exposures of members of the public, but the situation will be kept under review.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information is available to his Department of the additional exposure to radiation of members of the public expected to arise from the prospective new nuclear power station at Trawsfynydd; what assessment level would be used in the safety case for a new station in respect of the maximum radiation exposure of any member of the public during normal operations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: No decisions have been taken by the CEGB about the timing of the closure of the present station at Trawsfynydd, or about whether it should be replaced.

If any further nuclear power station were to be constructed at Trawsfynydd, any additional exposure to members of the public would depend on the type of station constructed and it is not possible to make a precise calculation at this stage. However, the criteria recommended by ICRP will be fully taken into account in assessing the safety case for any such power station.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether his Department provided information to the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee relevant to the study of liquid radioactive discharges from Trawsfynydd nuclear power station mentioned in the sixth annual report of that body; what reports his Department has received of that study; whether any further studies have been undertaken or commissioned; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information was provided by the Directorate of Fisheries Research at the request of the Department, which received a copy of the relevant paper. The directorate carries out an extensive programme of monitoring in the aquatic environment around major United Kingdom nuclear sites, including the effects of liquid radioactive discharges from Trawsfynydd nuclear power station. The results are published annually by MAFF in a series of reports entitled "Radioactivity in Surface and Coastal Waters of the British Isles".

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if, further to his reply to the hon. Member for Merionnydd Nant Conwy on 12 December, Official Report, column 317, concerning the estimated doses of radioactivity received by critical groups in respect of Trawsfynydd nuclear power station, he will state (a) what members of the public comprise the critical group mentioned, (b) what pathway or pathways of exposure are relevant for members of that critical group and (c) the annual number of sample measurements used to derive the estimated annual doses received by members of that critical group; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: (a) The members of the public comprising the critical group are anglers who consume rainbow and brown trout caught in the Lake.

(b) The relevant pathway is internal irradiation from the consumed fish.

(c) Approximately four samples per year each of rainbow and brown trout are analysed on behalf of the Department to assess the critical group dose. Each sample consists of approximately six individual fish. Further, more numerous analyses are carried out by the site operator as a condition of authorisation. The results of these two programmes are in agreement. The actual numbers of samples vary somewhat from year to year depnding on availability.

"A Good Old Age"

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales what action he intends to take to improve services for elderly people in Wales in the light of consultation on his Department's document, "A Good Old Age"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In the light of the encouraging response to "A Good Old Age" I intend to establish a programme of demonstration projects in order to stimulate new developments in the provision of care for elderly people in Wales. I have issued a circular today which invites local authorities, health authorities and other organisations to review the scope for further development of their services in the light of "A Good Old Age" and to submit bids for this programme. I intend to make available for this programme sums of up to £1 million in 1987-88, up to £2 million in 1988-89 and up to £4 million in 1989-90. I also intend to continue this special funding during the following five years in the light of available resources. A copy of the circular has been placed in the Library of the House.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Official Unionist and Democratic Unionist Parties

15. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish evidence available to him of links between the Official Unionist and Democratic Unionist parties and paramilitary organisations.

Mr. Tom King: Where there is any evidence to suggest that a member of a political party, or anyone else, may be involved with a proscribed organisation the police will make inquiries and, where appropriate, bring charges against those concerned. It is no part of the Government's or the Royal Ulster Constabulary's duties to investigate the legitimate activities of constitutional political parties.

Security

16. Mr. Stuart Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the security situation in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: Since 27 November, three civilians and one policeman have died as a result of the security situation in the province. Sixy one people died in Northern Ireland last year as a result of the security situation and one person has already died this year.

The security threat remains high and there are no grounds for complacency, but the courageous and determined efforts of the security forces are continuing to yield results. During 1986 a total of 655 people were charged with serious offences, including 12 with murder and 215 weapons, 29,000 rounds of ammunition and almost 5,400 lb of explosives have been recovered. Over 531 people were convicted during 1986 of offences related to terrorism.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

18. Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he last met the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary; and what was discussed.

Mr. Tom King: I have regular meetings with the Chief Constable and the General Officer Commanding in Northern Ireland to discuss policy issues of common concern in the security field. It is not my practice to give details of the timing of these meetings.

Devolved Government

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals he has for promoting devolved government in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Tom King: The Government have proposed a round table conference on devolution and in advance of this is ready to facilitate informal talks among the parties. There is a wide measure of support for a return of greater responsibility to Belfast from Westminster and we have received a number of representations in support of this.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will make a statement on the level of co-operation regarding cross border security since the signing of the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

Mr. Scott: While security co-operation on the ground between the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Garda Siochana was already good, the Anglo-Irish Agreement has resulted in increased contact and co-operation at all levels between the two forces. Three joint working parties established by the two police forces have now reported and a special ministerial meeting within the framework of the intergovernmental conference was held on 31 October to review progress in implementing, the ability of the security forces to combat cross-border terrorism will be significantly increased.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General what is his latest estmate estimate of the number of people actively seeking work who are classified as unemployed; and what percentage of the total unemployed this represents.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. According to the results of the labour force survey, in Great Britain in the spring of 1985, there were 2·81 million people without a job who had sought work in the week prior to the survey compared with 3·13 million claiming benefits as unemployed people. Further details are contained in an article published in the October 1986 issue of Employment Gazette entitled "Unemployment figures: the claimant count and the Labour Force Survey".

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if he will publish a table for each region Scotland and Wales, showing the net loss or gain in numbers, and by percentages in (a) employees, (b) manufacturing employment, (c) the service sector and (d) construction for the years June 1979 to June 1983 and June 1983 to June 1986.

Mr. Lee: The information is given in the following table. The comparisions with June 1986 are based on the slightly revised estimates of employees in employment for that date which were released earlier today. Therefore they do not correspond in all respects to figures given to the hon. Member previously.

[1] Regional estimates of self employment are not available for separate industries.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General what is his estimate for each regional area of the numbers and percentages of net job losses or gains by each industrial category, including categories of service employment and the construction industry, from June 1979 to June 1986.

Mr. Lee: The figures are given in the following tables. They are based on the slightly revised estimates of employees in employment for June 1986 which were released earlier today. Therefore they do not correspond in all respects to figures given to the hon. Member previously.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General what is his estimate for each regional area and the United Kingdom as a whole of the number of employees in second jobs in (a) June 1979 and (b) June 1986.

Mr. Lee: Estimates from the 1979 and 1985 labour force surveys of the number of persons in employment with a second job as an employee are presented in the following table:

[1] Estimates relate to the spring of each year. Figures for 1985 include those on government schemes, whereas 1979 only include those on schemes if reported as in employment.
[2] Less than 10,000.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General what is his estimate for each parliamentary constituency of the United Kingdom of (a) the numbers of net job losses or gains since June 1979, (b) the numbers of manufacturing job losses or gains and (c) the numbers of construction job losses or gains; and if he will express each figure as a percentage of the numbers employed in June 1979 in each sector.

Mr. Lee: I regret that the information requested is not available.

The Department's statistics for parliamentary constituencies monitor only net changes in total employees between census dates and do not provide an industry breakdown. The available census estimates for constituencies are from the September 1981 census of employment. Estimates from the following census, relating to September 1984, are not yet available.

MSC Schemes

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the participation of people between the ages of 55 and 65 years in Manpower Services Commission sponsored schemes.

Mr. Trippier: I have agreed that there should now be common age limits for men and women on Manpower Services Commission employment and training programmes. The cut-off age for participation in MSC measures is the 65th birthday.

The latest date for entry to programmes is determined on a programme-by-programme basis, depending upon the aims and objectives of the programme concerned.

Information on cut-off ages for entry for each scheme is as follows:

	Age
Community Programme	63
Voluntary Projects Programme	63
Enterprise Allowance Scheme	*65
Job Training Scheme	65
Training Grants for Employers	65
Wider Opportunities for Training Programme	65
Restart	65

* From 1.2.87.

Mr. D.E. Thomas asked the Paymaster General what proportion of those taking part in Manpower Services Commission sponsored schemes in England are (a) over 50 but under 60 years of age and (b) over 60 years of age.

Mr. Trippier: The information is not available in the form requested. However the latest scheme-by-scheme information available shows:

Enterprise Allowance Scheme—in England 12·5 per cent. of entrants are aged 45-55 and 5·3 per cent are aged 55-65.

Community Programme—in Great Britain 7 per cent of participants are aged 45-55 and 3 per cent. are aged over 55.

Voluntary Projects Programme—in Great Britain 8 per cent. of participants are aged 50 and over.

Jobstart—in Great Britain 5·9 per cent. of allowance recipients are aged 45-54, 1·8 per cent. are aged 55-59 and 0·4 per cent. aged 60-64.

Adult Training Schemes—the information is not available nationally.

Information is not kept on the ages of people counselled under the restart programme or entering restart courses or jobclubs.

Health and Safety

Mr. Hoyle asked the Paymaster General when the names and addresses of companies where major accidents, as defined by regulation 2(1) of the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1984, will be published by the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Trippier: There is no intention to publish the names and addresses of companies where major accidents, as defined by regulation 2(1) of the CIMAH regulations, have occurred.

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Employment when the information about major accidents sent by the Health and Safety Executive to the European Commission, as required by regulation 5 of the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1984, will be published.

Mr. Trippier: There is no intention to publish information about major accidents sent by the Health and Safety Executive to the European Commission under regulation 5 of the CIMAH regulations.

The European Commission will set up a register containing certain details of all major accidents notified to it by the member states, including the United Kingdom. The information in this register will be made available to the competent authorities in each member state so that they may benefit from the exchange of information and take account of any lessons to be learnt.

Foreign Nationals

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Paymaster General if his policy of allowing foreign companies to recruit, without work permits, specified numbers of foreign nationals to work in the United Kingdom permits such companies to employ, in addition to their quota, people of dual nationality, including British citzenship, whether recruited in the United Kingdom or abroad; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The conditions of the work permit scheme apply to all foreign nationals who are subject to immigration control, with the exception of certain categories as set out in paragraphs 31 and 33 of the statement of changes in immigration rules, laid before Parliament on 9 February 1983 under section 3(2) of the Immigration Act 1971. It is incorrect to say that Her Majesty's Government have a policy whereby foreign companies are permitted to recruit a specified number of foreign nationals without work permits. People who have British citizenship, even if dual nationals, have the right of abode here and do not require a work permit.

Availability for Work Test

Mr. Nicholls asked the Paymaster General if he is satisfied with the operation of the availability for work test; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987]: The procedural changes which I announced on 28 October 1986 and which are based on experiments conducted last summer are now operating in the majority of our benefit offices.

The procedures are designed to meet criticism from the Public Accounts Committee of shortcomings in checking on the longstanding requirement that benefit should be paid only to unemployed claimants who are available for work.

It is too soon to assess the effectiveness of the new procedures in determining benefit entitlement.

Peckham (Task Force)

Ms. Harman asked the Paymaster General (1) how many new jobs have been created by the task force initiative in Peckham;

(2) how many of the new jobs created by the task force in Peckham have been filled by people resident in Peckham;

(3) how many more jobs he expects to be created as a direct result of the task force initiative in Peckham;

(4) how much of the money allocated to the task force initiative in Peckham has already been spent;

(5) what is the cost per job of each job created by the task force initiative in Peckham;

(6) what are the new jobs created by the task force initiative in Peckham.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987, c. 54-55]: It is not possible to provide specific answers to all the hon. Member's questions because they require a detailed evaluation of the inner cities initiative which has no yet been carried out. The initiative was announced in February 1986 and the north Peckham task force was not in place with its small office and staff until 8 May 1986. The north Peckham task force has made considerable progress towards its objectives including job creation and, improving the employability of local residents.

The task force has established contacts and is working with a wide variety of local community organisations, the local authority and with the private sector. A plan has been drawn up as a framework for action in tackling the problems of the area. The plan includes a number of projects designed to increase employment and improve the employability of local people, which are being worked up as a matter of priority. These include:

(a) the establishment, in co-operation with a major clearing bank, of a grant and loan scheme for local small businesses;

(b) a scheme in conjunction with the MSC and the Industrial Society to give young people access to enterprise training and on-going encouragement and support with a view to encouraging self employment;

(c) creating local jobs through a scheme tackling home security problems on local council estates. A first project now under way is the improvement of lighting and external security on the north Peckham estate;

(d) the establishment of a shop run as a co-operative by the local community on the Gloucester grove estate;

(e) creation of workshop start-up units from disused garages on a local estate;

(f) support for provisions of customised employer-based training for 100 local people;

(g) improvements to two adult education institute branches to enable training capacity to be increased (benefiting an additional 20 north Peckham residents), and a training course for 15 disadvantaged local residents to be recommenced.

A substantial number of other projects are at various stages of development. The task force is also working closely with the private sector, other Government Departments and statutory and voluntary agencies in the area to unlock all available resources and to ensure that they are targeted to maximum effect. We are attaching high priority to the introduction of community programme work experience opportunities to the people of north Peckham which has in the past been severely limited by local political opposition.

The task force was instrumental in securing a grant of £850,000 from the Department of the Environment's estates action for a crime prevention and environmental improvement package for the Gloucester grove estate.

A secondee from the voluntary sector has just joined the task force to work with unemployed alienated young people.

No specific allocation of funds to individual task forces has been made. They are intended to improve the targeting of all Government expenditure in their areas. Total central Government expenditure in the north Peckham area was estimated to be £6·4 million in 1985-86. To date some £72,000 has been committed to projects in the north Peckham task force area out of specific inner city initiative funds. Other projects under development, including those described above, are expected to require resources out of the same specific funds totalling some £600,000.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Mortgage Interest Relief

Sir William Clark asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many taxpayers who are not married claim mortgage interest relief on the same property; and what is the additional cost to the Exchequer of the mortgage interest relief enjoyed by the second person in all such cases.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply which I gave to the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) on 8 December 1986, at column 85.

Hansard Press

Ms. Harman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) when new technology will be introduced at the Official Report Press;

(2) if retraining will be available for those copyreaders at the Official Report Press whose jobs will be affected by the introduction of new technology.

Mr. Brooke: New technology, which is regarded in the printing industry as referring to computer-assisted typesetting and associated techniques, was introduced at the Official Report Press (Hansard Press) in January 1981.

Any further change which could affect jobs, including those of copyreaders, will be discussed with representatives of the trades unions involved. Such discussions would include the scope for retraining.

European Commission

Mr. Higgins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) by what means he proposes to inform the House of a payment of own resources made in advance at the demand of the European Commission, following the decision of the European Court of Justice in case 93/85; and whether the House will be given the opportunity of expressing an opinion on the circumstances which have given rise to the need for the advancing of payments before the transfer is made;

(2) whether, since the decision of the European Court of Justice in case 93/85 is contrary to the Government's contention that advance payments of own resources to the European Commission require specific parliamentary approval, the United Kingdom intends to propose in the Council of Ministers the amendment or annulment of articles 10 and 11 of Council regulation 1891/77, so far as they involve an absolute liability to make such payments and impose a penalty for late compliance;

(3) what estimate he had made of the extent to which current cash flow problems of the Community are likely to give rise to demands for advanced payments of own resources in the present European Community budgetary year.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Incomes

Mr. Clay asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the increase in the average real net incomes of the working population since May 1979.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Computer Contracts

Mr. Dalyell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to exclude from consideration for Government computer contracts those firms which have been found guilty of infringing immigration laws.

Mr. Brooke: In order to secure value for money for the taxpayer the Government seek to ensure that the firms with which they deal are capable of fulfilling their commitments. Judgment in this context would naturally embrace proven breaches of the law.

European Community (Funds)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the payments received from the European Community from each of the structural funds and from the European steel and coal Fund from 1975 for each year for (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Scotland; and if he will provide a detailed breakdown of the money received by Scotland from the European social fund.

Mr. Brooke: Information concerning Community receipts by territorial areas within the United Kingdom, and individual projects and programmes benefiting from these receipts, is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. A breakdown of United Kingdom receipts by receiving Departments (including the Scottish Office) and by type of expenditure (for example, the regional development and social funds) is contained in table 3.3.3 of the public expenditure White Paper published on 14 January (Command 56-II, page 71). Information on total United Kingdom receipts from the structural funds is also contained in table 3.3.2 of the White Paper (page 70).

European Commission Budget

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the most up-to-date figures for the United Kingdom contribution to the European Economic Commission budget in each year from 1975 (a) at current prices and (b) at 1986 prices.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Departmental Computer Network

Mr. Dalyell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the value of the contract being put out to tender for the Government data network; which firms have tendered for the contract; and which firms have been short-listed.

Mr. Brooke: The Government data network project is now at the specification stage.

A statement of service requirement will be issued shortly to five consortia:

Cable and Wireless with ICL;
Computer Sciences Corporation (CSC) with British Telecom;
Electronic Data Services (EDS) with Northern Telecom;
Plessey with CAP;
Racal Milgo with SCICON.

The consortia have a month to produce proposals. These will be valuated and a shortlist produced. Further and more technical discussions will be necessary to agree memoranda of agreement before tendering and award of contract, which is targeted for September this year.

The early stage of this project and the nature of the procurement leading to a service contract means that a contract value cannot yet be given.

Invisible Earnings

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the actual and the proportionate contributions to the United Kingdom's invisible earnings of the consulting engineering profession during the course of the last financial year.

Mr. John Patten: I have been asked to reply.

I shall answer this question shortly.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Alcohol (Health Warnings)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he has any plans to introduce mandatory health warning labels on all alcohol containers;

(2) if he has any plans to introduce mandatory signs or posters in premises where intoxicating liquor is sold concerning the health risks involved in drinking.

Mrs. Currie: We have no plans to do so. It is not the use but the misuse of alcohol which causes harm.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will direct local offices of his Department to publish weekly in local newspapers a notice to advise potential claimants of the additional heating allowance whether the week is a qualifying week or not a qualifying week.

Mr. Major: Local offices have been directed to publish advertisements in their local newspapers this week inviting potential claimants to apply for extra help with their heating costs. The situation will be reviewed next week.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, for the week 5 January to 11 January, the average daily temperatures for each weather station designated for measuring temperatures for exceptionally severe weather payments; and what was the lowest recorded temperature for each station during that week.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he intends to take to improve the arrangements for payment of severe weather assistance in Wales.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will now introduce emergency regulations to give additional severe weather heating allowance to the elderly and people on low incomes.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Members to my reply to the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) on 13 January, at column 132.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to publicise the new severe weather payments; on what date the new leaflet will be published and where the new leaflet will be placed for public information.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987]: Details of the new arrangements for extra help with heating costs because of exceptionally cold weather are contained in leaflets and posters which are being distributed to the Department's local offices this week.

In accordance with the reply which I gave to the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) on 13 January at column 132, these leaflets and posters will be made available through appropriate outlets. These may include unemployment benefit offices, job centres, health centres, GPs' surgeries, community and religious centres, social services departments, housing benefit offices, advice bureaux, libraries, welfare organisations, gas and electricity showrooms and in more isolated areas, supermarkets and other shops. In addition, advertisements, including a claim form, will appear in national and local newspapers and freesheets and publicity will be sought on local radio and television.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give a list of the weather stations not included in the list of those used for calculating severe weather payments, indicating which of them had (a) minimum night temperatures of minus 1·5 deg or below on any night, (b) daily mean temperatures of minus 1·5 deg or below and (c) weekly mean temperatures of minus 1·5 deg or below for the week 5 January to 11 January inclusive.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987]: The information requested is not provided to the Department. There are over 500 weather stations which supply this information to the Meotorological Office, but I understand there is often a considerable delay, up to about six weeks, in doing so.

Young People in Care

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish such details as are available to him on the number of young people in care, or subject to care orders, who have absconded in each local authority area in each of the past three years and to date; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The numbers of children and young people in care who, on 31 March, had absconded for more than one week from residential accommodation are given in the table for 1982, 1983 and 1984 for each local authority.

[1] Estimated from information for earlier years.

Abortions

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the number of abortions carried out in each health authority area for each of the past five years and to date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The numbers of legal abortions to women resident in each regional and each district health authority in England and Wales are published in table 24 of "Abortion Statistics, series AB Nos. 8-12", copies of which are in the Library.

Figures on the numbers of legal abortions performed in Wales and in each regional health authority in England to women resident in the United Kingdom are shown in table 20 of the same publications. Statistics on the number of legal abortions carried out in each district health authority are not published for reasons of maintaining confidentiality.

Surrogate Motherhood (Abuses)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has received any further representations concerning possible abuses of the Surrogacy Arrangements Act by surrogate motherhood agencies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: None since I replied to my hon. Friend's question on 21 October 1986, at column 860.

The consultation document "Legislation on Human Infertility Services and Embryo Research" invites views, inter alia, on extending restrictions on the operation of surrogacy agencies.

Hospitals (Coal)

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what experiments are being conducted within the National Health Service in the use of imported coal for heating hospitals; and what guidance his Department has issued to health authorities on this subject;

(2) if he will make it his policy that the National Health Service should purchase only British coal for use in hospitals.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Member's Correspondence

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth may expect to receive a definitive reply to his letter of 24 October which refers to the Motor and Cycle Trades Benevolent Fund.

Mr. Lyell: I replied to my hon. Friend today.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) when the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth may expect to receive a reply to his letters of 31 October and 11 December which refer to Mr. N. Smith of Rugby;

(2) when the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth may expect to receive a reply to his letters of 12 November and 11 December 1986 which refer to his constituent Mrs. Sheila Denney;

(3) when the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth may expect to receive a reply to his letter dated 11 November which refers to his constituent Mr. Thomas O'Carroll.

Mr. Lyell: I replied to my hon. Friend yesterday.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth may expect to receive a reply to his letters of 30 October and 11 December 1986 which refer to Mrs. Hopkinson of Rugby.

Mrs. Currie: I replied to my hon. Friend on 12 January.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimate he now makes of the cumulative effect on public expenditure (a) in aggregate and (b) broken down by component of changes in social security each year since 1979.

Mr. Major: Information on the increase in public expenditure on social security since 1979-80 is set out in successive public expenditure White Papers. Information for 1979-80 is given in table 3.12 of "the Government's Expenditure Plans 1986-87 to 1987-88" (Cmnd. 9428) and similar information for 1980-81 is contained in table 3.15 of "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1986-87 to 1988-89" (Cmnd. 9702). For 1981-82 and succeeding years, the information can be found in table 3.15 of "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1987-88 to 1989-90" (Cmnd. 56).

Medical Students

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many students entered medical school in the United Kingdom in each of the last seven years; and what information he has on comparable figures in France, West Germany and Italy.

Mr. Newton: The numbers of students entering medical school in the United Kingdom in each of the past seven years are as follows:

Academic Year	Medical School intake
1980-81	4,010
1981-82	4,072
1982-83	4,154
1983-84	4,108
1984-85	4,125
1985-86	4,093
1986-87	[1]4,137

[1] Provisional.

Comparable figures are not readily available for the other countries.

Health Expenditure

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest figures available for the percentage of gross domestic product spent on health, health expenditure per head of population, number of practising doctors per 100,000 of the population and hospital beds per 1,000 population for the United Kingdom; and what information is available on comparable figures in Germany, France, the Netherlands, Denmark, Belgium, Italy, Luxembourg, Ireland, Greece, Spain, Portugal, and the EEC on average, the United States of America and Sweden.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have the information that is available as soon as possible.

Health Statistics

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest figures on life expectancy, infant mortality rates, and numbers on sickness benefit as a percentage of working population in the United Kingdom; and what information is available on comparable figures in West Germany, France, Italy, the Netherlands, Denmark, Belgium, and the European Economic Community average.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have the information that is available as soon as possible.

AIDS

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will consider compensation for the families of haemophiliacs who die as a result of contracting the AIDS virus through blood transfusions; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to compensate those haemophiliacs who have been infected with AIDS by Factor VIII brought from the United States of America.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987]: There is no state compensation scheme for those who, like haemophiliacs infected with the AIDS virus, unfortunately suffer adverse effects from their medical treatment. Compensation may be awarded by the courts in cases where negligence has been proved. Compensation for the families of haemophiliacs who die from AIDS infection may similarly be awarded by the courts.

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will estimate the number of haemophiliacs currently infected with the AIDS virus through blood transfusions.

Mr. Newton: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 25 November 1986, at columns 199-200. These are the most recent figures available for haemophiliacs who have been found to be HIV antibody positive.

The transmission of HIV to haemophiliacs was through the use of blood products in their treatment and not through blood transfusion. Blood products used by haemophiliacs are now heat treated to inactivate HIV.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what date he advised health authorities, when deciding on the disposal of land or buildings, to take into account any plans for the development of services for those suffering from AIDS.

Mr. Newton: The requirement for health authorities to take into account other health service needs and developments before disposing of properties is a standing one which has been included in the National Health Service "Handbook on Land Transactions" since 1977.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he proposes to reply to the three questions from the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras about hospital waiting lists, due for answer on 10 December 1986.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him yesterday.

Diabetics

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make disposable needles and syringes available to diabetics.

Mrs. Currie: If disposable needles and syringes are considered necessary for a patient's treatment, they may be supplied through the hospital service. The possibility of making them available on general practitioners' prescription is under review.

Cystic Fibrosis

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will exempt from prescription charges adults suffering from cystic fibrosis.

Mr. Newton: We have no plans to do so.

Drug Users (Services)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services over what period his Department has allocated £17·1 million under central funding to improve services to drug users.

Mrs. Currie: The first grants under the central funding initiative for the development of local services for drug misusers were approved in late 1983. The Department is now determining the last few applications for grants. In the majority of cases grants are made for a period of three years.

Departmental Circulars

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list his Department's obsolete circulars which have been cancelled, indicating in each case the date it was first issued, whether the circular has been succeeded by another more up to date one, or whether the circumstances to which it applied no longer pertain.

Mrs. Currie: I have today placed in the Library a list of the 531 circulars which have been cancelled. The date of issue is apparent in every case from the reference number, except for the HSC(IS) series, which was published in 1974 and 1975. The cancellation of these circulars does not necessarily imply any change in policy, although many of them gave specific time-related guidance which is now out of date. All future circulars will contain a review date on which they will either be reviewed or cancelled. I have also placed in the Library a list of the 398 circulars which are still extant.

Pensioners

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table providing the latest available figures for the number of retirement pensioners resident in each parliamentary constituency in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lyell: Information about retirement pensioners can be provided for Great Britain or for England, Scotland and Wales separately, but not for smaller areas of the country.

Hypothermia

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pensioners in Hull died of hypothermia and co-related illnesses indicating which in the months November 1985 to April 1986.

Mrs. Currie: There were five deaths to pensioners registered in the Hull registration sub-district during that period, with any mention of hypothermia on the death certificate. This is irrespective of whether hypothermia did or did not appear as an underlying cause. (Pensioners are defined as males aged 65 years and over and females aged 60 years and over). From the material available it is not possible to identify deaths from co-related diseases.

Local Offices

Mr Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all the social security offices which have closed for either a whole day or days, or parts of a day or days, each month in the last year, in each case indicating the cause.

Mr. Lyell: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Hospitals (Computers)

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received as to the adequacy of the budgets for the computer facilities which are being required in newly developing hospitals.

Mrs. Currie: None that appear to relate to what my hon. Friend seems to have in mind. The allocation of resources for such a purpose would in any case be a matter for the district and regional health authorities concerned.

Hospital Parking (Solihull)

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the planned levels of car parking facilities at the new Solihull district general hospital.

Mrs. Currie: Car parking facilities are being provided within the Department's recommended guidance contained in DHSS circular DS 97/71, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Breast Cancer

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the actions he has taken since 24 December 1985 to bring into operation breast cancer screening systems nationwide.

Mrs. Currie: The Government will be making an announcement on breast cancer screening in the near future.

Benefits

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the numbers and proportion of unemployed persons who are not in receipt of any social security benefit.

Mr. Lyell: At 14 August 1986 the total number of unemployed claimants was 3,168,100. Of these 520,548

(16·43 per cent.) were not in receipt of unemployment benefit or supplementary benefit (though some may have had other benefits, for example, child benefit).

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Alternative Land Use

Mr. Steen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are his Department's estimates of the number of acres of land currently used for agriculture which will no longer be used for that purpose in each of the next three years; and if he will make a statement as to the change of use which he envisages, in a percentage breakdown.

Mr. Jopling: The total area of agricultural land, including rough grazing, as recorded by agricultural censuses, has been tending to decline for many years as land as been utilised for forestry, housing, roads and other purposes. I have no detailed estimates of the precise pattern of change for each of the next three years as this will depend on many factors, including the demand for land for these non-agricultural purposes.

Agricultural Policy

Mr. Spearing asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a Green Paper setting out the options open to Her Majesty's Government, both within and outside the current regulations determining the common agricultural policy of the European Economic Community, in their strategic policy for agriculture within the United Kingdom, with particular reference to policies that (a) encourage good husbandry, (b) promote levels of employment and economic activity in rural areas and (c) conserve the natural and man-made rural environment, and enhance good management of uplands and the national parks.

Mr. Gummer: I already seek to ensure that the public are fully aware of the options open to the Community and to the United Kingdom as a member of the Community.

Aircraft Noise

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the positions and functions of those members of staff of his Department who are contributing to the work of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation committee on the challenges of modern society pilot study on aircraft noise in a modern society.

Mr. Donald Thompson: My Department has not made any input into this study.

Pelagic Fisheries

Mr. Powley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the Fisheries Ministers have yet completed their review of the restrictive licensing arrangements in respect of the pelagic fisheries; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Fisheries Ministers have given thorough and detailed consideration to the restrictive licensing arrangements for the main mackerel and herring fisheries in the light of the current and prospective situation in the fisheries and of the views submitted by fishing industry organisations in response to a consultative paper issued by the Fisheries Departments in October 1985. We have reached the following conclusions.

The quota management difficulties experienced prior to the introduction in July 1980 of restrictive licensing arrangements for purse seiners and freezer trawlers have substantially eased reflecting both the overall reduction in the number of such vessels in the United Kingdom fleet and an increase in the available catching opportunities. Since 1980, the number of purse seine vessels in the pelagic fleet has declined from 59 to 50, whereas all 26 freezer trawlers, then licensed to fish for pelagic species, have left the fleet. For the last five years, not all the quotas available to the United Kingdom for mackerel and herring have been fully taken up; in 1986 it is estimated that, despite the operations of the freezer trawlers provisionally licensed in 1985, the United Kingdom's main pelagic quotas were 15 per cent. under utilised in total. These quotas have now been further increased for 1987. Consequently, while we believe that the special licensing restrictions on purse seiners and freezer trawlers in the pelagic fisheries should, given the catching power of such vessels, continue for the time being over and above the more general system of pressure stock licensing introduced in 1984, we have concluded that it would now be right to make certain modifications in their detailed application.

First, we have decided that in future pelagic licences for purse seiners and freezer trawlers should be interchangeable, thus allowing the balance of the fleet to adjust itself more effectively over the longer term to the situation in the fisheries and the needs of the market. However, given the strong evidence that a limited increase in catching capacity could lead to a fuller uptake of the quotas without undermining the viability of the existing fleet, and the very sharp decline since 1980 in the number of freezer trawlers compared with the change in the number of purse seiners, we have also decided to make available straight away a total of five new pelagic licences for such vessels. Two of these will be assigned to the two freezer trawlers which have been operating in the fisheries since 1985 on a provisional basis. Decisions on the three further freezer licences will be taken following consideration of all applications for such licences received by the Fisheries Departments before 1 March 1987.

Finally, the number of licences available for purse seiners and freezer trawlers for the pelagic fisheries will be reviewed annually to take account of any changes in the level of quotas available as well as their utilisation.

DEFENCE

Airborne Warning and Control System

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Defence which version of the Boeing airborne warning and control system aircraft has been ordered for the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The E-3A aircraft to meet the Royal Air Force's airborne early warning requirement will be based upon the latest production standard.

Aircraft Noise

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the positions and functions of those members of staff of his Department who are contributing to the work of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation committee on the challenges of modern society pilot study on aircraft noise in a modern society.

Mr. Freeman: My Department contributes representatives to each of the four sub-groups of the pilot study. In addition to the central staff divisions concerned, representratives attend from Royal Aircraft Establishment, Pyestock, the RAF Institute Community and Occupational Medicine and RAF Strike Command.

Military Data Network

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the value of the contract for the new proposed military data network; which firms have submitted bids; and which firms have been shortlisted.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I shall answer shortly.

Anthrax

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Defence if parts of the United Kingdom other than Gruinard were used for testing anthrax in connection with weapon research.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I shall answer shortly.

Radiation

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his reply of 8 December, Official Report, column 88, if he will (a) outline marine monitoring for radiation undertaken by his Department and (b) give the precise co-ordinates for the position of the Russian submarine sunk off the Scillies in 1970.

Mr. Stanley: My Department conducts marine environmental monitoring at Royal Navy bases in the United Kingdom, at the Holy Loch and at RN bases abroad under British jurisdiction. As stated in my reply to the hon. Member on 8 December, at column 88, my Department has not conducted any checks for radiation leaks from the Soviet submarine that sank off the Scilly Isles in 1970. I understand that the Soviet submarine sank in the vicinity of 48° 30′ N, 19° 45′ W.

Trident

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North, Official Report, 12 January, the figure of £2,750 million contractually committed to Trident includes the £820 million already spent on Trident; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Yes. The figure of £2,750 million committed to Trident includes the £820 million already spent.

DROPS

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the selected demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system MMLC truck designs proposed by Foden and Scammell in 1982 provided sufficient engine power to pull the fully laden LMLC trailer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: The Foden and Scammell original proposals provided a number of engine options and powers allowing a selection fully adequate for the DROPS vehicle and trailer configuration envisaged.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the need for the demountable rack off-loading and pickup system was first formally identified by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: The DROPS requirement was first formally endorsed in August 1982.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence when funds for the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system were first put into his Department's budgeted expenditure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: 1982.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what were the shortcomings identified by his Department in the Boughton's 1982 demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system proposal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: The Boughton system proposals in 1982-83 though competent in many respects fell short of those of its competitors both technically and economically. It would not be normal practice to disclose details of tender offers and assessments. The firm was afforded the opportunity of constructive debriefing after the competition.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what requirements on stacking flatracks was included in the 1985 specification against which the definitive demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system equipment was tendered; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: The 1985 specification required that empty flatracks could be stacked for storage and transit.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what part the issue of flatrack stacking played in Multilift's 1982 demountable rack off-loading pick-up system proposal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c.. 504]: Flatrack stacking was fully considered as requested in the statement of requirements in all main contractor proposals to which Multilift contributed.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what weight was given by the demountable rack off-loading pick-up system selection team to stackability of flatracks; and if he will make a statement; (2) to what extent the question of stacking was a criterion in the selection of demountable rack off-loading pick-up system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: Flatrack stacking was addressed in the statement of requirements and was thus an element fully considered in the assessment along with the many other factors.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what assessment was made by the 1982 demountable rack off-loading pick-up system selection team of the implications of the stacking of loaded flatracks for the size of field storage areas; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what assessment was made by his Department in 1980 of the implications of the stacking of loaded flatracks for the space required in storage areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: None.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish details of Boughton's shortcomings in its presentation for the demountable rack off-loading pick-up system contract; and if he will make37a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: No.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if those companies involved in 1982 provided drawings of their proposed load handling systems drawn onto the prime contractor's chassis under consideration for the demountable rack off-loading pick-up system; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what was the nature of such drawings as Multilift produced via the main contractors in 1982 in connection with the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December c. 504]: All companies' submissions for the 1982 DROPS competition provided adequate drawings or other supporting detail covering the widest field of vehicle-load handling system combinations.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations were received from any demountable rack off-loading pick-up system prime contractors in 1982 on Multilift's presentation and management; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: Multilift load-handling systems featured prominently in a number of main contractor submissions including those of the main contractors finally selected. I cannot, of course, discuss details of particular tender or contract submissions.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what allocations were introduced into the equipment produced for trials in 1984 after its feasibility study response in 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: The equipment furnished for the Department's DROPS traps in 1984 was based upon proposals of the selected competing main contractors. The final specification took up certain options offered and other changes ordered by the Department affecting engine power (340 bhp), adoption of automatic transmission and hydraulic power take-off. "Live" power take-off was the only feature not offered by companies other than Boughton's. Its specification had no significant cost implications.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the weight (a) originally estimated by Multilift for its Mk II flat flatrack system and (b) of the equipment built; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: The difference was 7·5 per cent.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the decision was taken by his Department that the requirement for low mobility demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system was to be provided by the use of a trailer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: The use of a trailer in this role was envisaged in the DROPS requirement first formally approved in 1982.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what were the main conclusions of the project carried out by his Department into how the low mobility transport role after the introduction of demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system would be carried out; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: I am not clear to which project my right hon. Friend is referring.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence to what degree of detail the selected main contractors and subcontractors proposed designs and analysis of a trailer for demountable rack off-load and pick-up system LMLC; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: The selected main contractors' proposals fully met the Department's essential assessment needs in these regards.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence if Boughton's put forward detailed proposals for, and recommendations on, a trailer as the preferred solution for demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system LMLC; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: Yes.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the trailers proposed by the selected main contractors and subcontractors met the stated requirement for LMLC demountable racking off-loading and pick-up system in respect of one-man operation and maximum loading; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: Trailers proposed by the selected main contractors were judged adequate in both respects and for the subsequent trials.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment was made by his Department in reviewing the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system feasibility study in 1983 of the implications for road traffic law of trailer-truck combinations selected to fulfil the low mobility demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system role on the roads; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: The Department's competition assessments in 1983 took due account of proposed truck-trailer combinations in the context of the relevant construction and use regulations.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the gross weight of (a) Boughton 1982 proposed demountable rack off-loading and demountable system LMLC truck-trailer combination and (b) the combinations selected; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: The gross estimated weight of the selected combination is some 3,000 kg more than the weight estimated in Boughton's proposals.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proposal was made at the time of the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system submissions in 1982 by the two selected contractors as to the most cost effective way of meeting the stated requirements for the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 16 December 1986, c. 504]: The proposals made by the selected contractors covered a wide range of solutions and options and I regret I cannot disclose particular details of tender offers.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence if those responsible for the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system selection in 1983 included any officers with previous experience of the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system trials and development work carried out by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780]: The DROPS assessment process took place under the direction of professional procurement staff responsible for the development and procurement of armed services vehicles of all types. They worked in close conjunction with the Army's logistic authorities who commissioned and directed the earlier research and concept trials which established the DROPS requirement.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence how the mechanical efficiency of the Boughton demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system equipment criticised by his Department for its higher hydraulic pressures compared with that of other systems selected in preference to it; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780.]: The Department judged the Boughton system to be inferior in performance to others on a number of technical grounds, including the higher hydraulic pressures mentioned.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence to what factors he attributes the failure of the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system procurement to meet its in-service date; what effect the non-involvement of his Department's demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system experts in the assessment of proposals had in his regard; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780.]: There has been no failure. DROPS will enter service in 1989. The original staff requirement of 1982 envisaged a date of late 1988 subject to the results of the considerable feasibility study and other work which still had to be undertaken.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department's team of demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system experts making the 1983 selection were aware of the conclusions of project 226 regarding the use of trailers to provide the low mobility demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system function; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780.]: Yes.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what changes have been made to the equipment specifications proposed in 1982 by the successful demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system competitors; to what extent those changes introduce any features proposed and costed in Boughton's production cost estimates but not costed in the selected competitors' original estimates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780.]: The equipment furnished for the Department's DROPS trials in 1984 was based upon proposals of the selected competing main contractors. The final specification took up certain options offered and other changes ordered by the Department affecting engine power (340 bhp), adoption of automatic transmission and hydraulic power take-off. "Live" power take-off was the only feature not offered by companies other than Boughton's. Its specification had no significant cost implications.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the prices and production cost estimates put forward by Foden and by Scammell in respect of their 1982 demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system equipment proposals were the subject of disclaimers and caveats; if Boughton's prices or production cost estimates were accompanied by any such disclaimers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780]: The production cost estimates and associated commercial terms of all firms in the 1982-83 DROPS competition were related to the particular equipment proposals, designs and specifications they offered. It is not the usual practice to disclose detailed tender information provided commercially in confidence.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence how the specifications for the MMLC demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system equipments proposed by (a) Foden and (b) Scammell in the 1982 demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system feasibility study response compared with those for the MMLC demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system equipments proposed by Boughton in respect of the engine power, transmission and all features including the number of wheels and axles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780]: It is not the usual practice to disclose detailed confidential tender information of this character.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence how the price put forward in 1982 by Scammell in respect of Boughton's demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system load handling systems compared with the price put forward by Scammell for Multilift's flat flatrack load handling system, for Multilift's A-frame flatrack load handling system and for Powell Duffryn's A-frame flatrack load handling system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780]: I cannot disclose details of particular tender prices.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the requirement that the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system requirement that the vehicle be able to transmit power to the wheels at the same time as operating the hydraulic load handling system a live hydraulic facility was first formally recognised by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780]: The Department's decision to adopt live hydraulics in DROPS vehicles was taken in 1985 following its extensive field and engineering trials of this and alternative forms of power take-off.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, at the time in 1984 when he gave as a reason for the non-selection of the Boughton's demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system equipment that it lacked power to lift the load of 14 tonnes required by the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system statement of requirement, he was aware of the United States army trial reports stating that the Boughton equipment had regularly picked up 16·5 tonnes without difficulty in the worst of conditions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780]: The Department's decisions not to select Boughton came from its assessment of the particular equipment proposals which the firm submitted in the competition in 1982. These assessments were the subject of the then Secretary of State's correspondence with my right hon. Friend in February 1984. They could thus take no account of United States Army trials of other equipment which took place only subsequent to the British Army competition and whose reports were available only later in 1984.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was his Department's assessment, after Boughton proposed the inclusion of live hydraulics in its 1982 demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system submission, of the role of live hydraulics as a deciding factor in the ability of the demountable rack off-loading system to pick up loads sunk in mud; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780]: Based upon its consideration of all the proposals and solutions offered by industry as well as its own experience the Department's assessment in 1983 was that its trials should cover live hydraulics and alternative forms of power take-off across the full spectrum of operating conditions.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what his Department has told Boughton about the implications of live hydraulics for the cost of demountable rack off-loading and pick-up systems; whether the prices and production cost estimates of any competitive equipments proposed in 1982 without live hydraulics were adjusted for this and other increases in the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system specification before the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system selection team compared these prices and prodution cost estimates without Boughton's submission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780]: The tender assessment process in 1982-83 took full account of all relevant considerations including differences in detailed specifications and prices offered by all the competing firms. I am not aware of any particular information passed to Messrs. Boughton on live hydraulic costs or other implications.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what criticisms his Department made of Boughton's proposed demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system regarding the hydraulic pressure at which it worked; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780]: Higher hydraulic pressures are generally considered less desirable on grounds of maintainability, reliability and, in certain instances, safety.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, in the 1982 statement of requirements for the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system any requirement was stated indicating either a maximum acceptable hydraulic pressure or a preference for low hydraulic pressures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780]: No. These are matters of normal professional engineering judgment.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied that his Department's demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system team of experts in 1983 understood the nature of all the offers submitted to it, that it was able to reconcile their drawings, their performance calculations and their written statements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780]: Yes.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what engine power was called for in the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system 1982 statement of requirement; whether Boughtons met that requirement in respect of both its IMMLC and MMLC proposals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780]: The original DROPS requirement statement to industry called for minimum engine powers of 10 bhp per tonne and 12 bhp per tonne for the medium and improved mobility vehicles respectively. The Boughton proposals considerably exceeded the requirement in both instances.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the equipment (a) as proposed in 1982 and (b) as built in 1984 by Fodens and Scammells met the stated minimum power requirements for demountable rack off-loading pick-up system IMMLC and MMLC vehicles contained in the 1982 stated requirements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780]: Both Foden's and Scammell's proposals and equipment fully met the indicated power requirements in the medium mobility range. In the improved medium range the power requirements were fully satisfied by Scammell: Fodens were slightly below.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what figure has been determined as the minimum power-to-weight requirements for the low mobility trailer combination of demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system to comply with United Kingdom or Federal German legislation or Army mobility requirements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780]: No particular figure has been determined: however the Army's DROPS equipment fully meets the requirements of United Kingdom legislation in these regards.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence when Boughton first proposed that the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system vehicle should have live hydraulics; what proposals were made regarding this facility by Fodens, Scammell Multilift in their 1982 demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system submissions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780]: The Boughton 1982 proposals employed live hydraulics: those of other firms provided for alternative solutions.

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Defence what evidence he has that British military technology related to the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system project is being passed to the Soviet Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 782]: None.

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Defence what evidence he has that the parent company of Multilift, recently awarded the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system contract, Partek of Finland has engaged in work for the military forces of the Soviet Union or any of its Warsaw pact allies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 782]: None. I understand that, as a matter of policy, Partek does not engage in such work.

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Defence what evidence he has that the parent company of Multilift, recently awarded the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system contract, Partek of Finland has any connection with the Russian civilian truck industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 782]: I have no knowledge of any such connection, although I understand that Partek has provided some commercial hydraulic equipment for waste disposal.

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the value of the production order for the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system programme.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 782]: The DROPS production orders so far announced are worth some £220 million.

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many firms were shortlisted for competitive trialling of the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 782]: Initially 11 firms provided main contractor proposals involving over 20 firms as main or subcontractors. Five firms were shortlisted for full main contractor assessment. Two main contractors (Foden Trucks and Scammell Motors) were finally selected to provide main equipments for the subsequent competitive trials, together with Multilift (two systems) and Powell Duffryn (load-handling systems), Marshalls of Cambridge and Multilift (flatracks), and Craven Tasker and Scottorn (trailers).

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department retains any copyright to the Miltilift mark IV demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 782]: The Multilift mark IV system is in essence proprietary. The Department's rights are limited to minor modifications to secure interoperability.

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will describe the export licensing controls to which the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system contract awarded to Multilift, Shrewsbury will be subject; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 782]: Like any other licensable equipment DROPS will require an export licence under the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1985 before it is exported. There would be full consideration of all relevant factors before an export licence was granted.

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the Comptroller and Auditor General has informed him when he expects to complete his investigation into the awarding of the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system project; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 782]: No. The Comptroller and Auditor General's current study of the DROPS project is part of his regular review of the Department's procurement.

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Defence how his Department defines a defence product for the purposes of export control and security classification; and if the Multilift mark IV demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system falls within that definition.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 782]: The Export of Goods (Control) Order 1985 sets out, often in detailed terms, the specification of those goods and materials which require an export licence before they can be exported from this country. The Multilift mark IV DROPS system, although unclassified, requires, under the definitions contained in the order, an export licence.

Sir Ian Gilmour asked the Secretary of State for Defence what specifications formed the basis of the production cost estimates of the successful demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system contenders in 1983 in comparison with those which were the subject of Boughton's production cost estimates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 780]: The production cost estimates and associated commercial terms of all firms in the 1982-83 DROPS competition were related to the particular equipment proposals, designs and specifications they offered. It is not the usual practice to disclose detailed tender information provided commercially in confidence.

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he plans to take to ensure that the technology of the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system contract is safeguarded for use by the United Kingdom and her allies.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 782]: DROPS technology is wholly conventional in nature and is readily available in many forms throughout the commercial vehicle and load handling system industries. Proprietary rights are safeguarded by their owners within the prevailing legal framework for intellectual property rights. DROPS equipment is subject to export licensing control in the usual way.

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Defence when invitations were first issued for proposals to supply a combined vehicle and load handling system (DROPS).

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 782]: August 1982.

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received from the company, Hearncrest Boughton in connection with allegations concerning intellectual property of the demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system project.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, c. 782]: Hearncrest Boughton has made a number of representations to the Ministry. In October 1985 the company claimed that 17 ideas which it believed to be original to Boughton had been incorporated in the DROPS concept of the trials equipment. To assist in formulating its claims the company was subsequently given special facilities to inspect this equipment but, in March 1986, following a careful examination by the Ministry's own intellectual property experts, Boughton was advised that, on the basis of the information that had been provided by the company, the Ministry did not believe that any unauthorised use would be made of any Boughton original ideas in the DROPS procurement. The reasons for the Ministry's views were fully explained in the correspondence with the chairman of the company, but the company was, nevertheless, given the opportunity to offer additional evidence in support of its claim if it so wished.

The company has not so far offered any such additional evidence, although it has been agreed that further discussions between relevant experts will take place as soon as the company is in a position to proceed.

WALES

Health Education

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether, in the light of the statement, Official Report, 21 November 1986, column 805, by the Secretary of State for Social Services, that the Health Education Council was to be reconstituted as a special health authority, he will make a statement on the future of health education in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Yes. I have decided that the health educational interests of Wales will be best served by a separate special health authority. The new body will take over the role in Wales of the Health Education Council, will carry on the work of the Health Education Advisory Committee for Wales and will assume responsibility for Heartbeat Wales. I envisage that Wales will benefit from the promotional aspects of the national AIDS campaign to be undertaken by the English authority, but that the Welsh AIDS campaign will continue its work in Wales under the aegis of the Welsh authority.

The new body should give a renewed impetus to health education in Wales and will further the very important work already carried out by the Health Education Council and the Health Education Advisory Committee for Wales. It will be in an advantageous position to bring together the activities of the various statutory and voluntary bodies in the Principality who have an interest in health education.

Much work needs to be done to bring the authority into being quickly and I shall make a further statement when decisions have been made on membership, staffing and resources.

Wales Tourist Board

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will allow the Wales Tourist Board to promote Wales overseas and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: We have no plans to introduce legislation to change the existing arrangements whereby the promotion of Wales overseas is handled primarily by the British Tourist Authority. However, as I explained to the Welsh Affairs Committee when I appeared before it on 27 November 1985, should we find that the interests of Wales are not being best served by these arrangements we would be prepared to consider alternative proposals.

Link Project

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he intends to take to promote the Government's link project in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: General publicity material on the link research initiative has been prepared and, as a first step in promoting the range of programmes covered, was circulated to academic institutions in Wales in December. Information is now about to be distributed to all relevant companies, and other organisations. Other opportunities for publicity will be used as they arise and the need for future promotion will be considered in the light of responses.

Milk Quota

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will introduce legislation to allow his Department to purchase milk quota which comes on the market for redistribution to other producers in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: No.

Housing Renovation Grants

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many outstanding claims for housing renovation grants each of the district councils in Wales have; and what is the projected cost of such outstanding claims.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information is shown in the table, as at 30 September 1986.

Local Authority	Claims Outstanding	Projected Costs (£000s)
Aberconwy	92	322
Alyn and Deeside	400	1,400

Wrexham Maelor	360	1,260
Ynys Môn	769	2,692
TOTAL	55,029	192,602

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much each of the district councils of Wales have allocated for housing renovation grants during each year since 1979.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information requested is not readily available and I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales by when he expects each of the district councils in Wales to have cleared the waiting list of claims for housing renovation grants made prior to 31 March 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Robinson: It is not possible to give such an estimate, as not all authorities have taken steps to identify how many outstanding applications are still current. While many have cleared all those originating before 1984, others have substantial numbers outstanding. The distribution of housing capital allocations takes account of the problems of those authorities with the longest grant backlogs.

ENERGY

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many applications for pressurised water reactor power stations he is currently considering.

Mr. Peter Walker: One: that for Sizewell B.

Power Stations (Maintenance)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, when he next meets the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board, he will discuss the maintenance and refurbishment of power stations.

Mr. Peter Walker: I meet the chairman of the CEGB regularly, to discuss a wide range of matters.

Domestic Oil Prices

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will raise with the major oil companies the reasons for the increase in the price per gallon of domestic heating oil in view of the impact on rural areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on Wednesday 14 January.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Zimbabwe (Pensions)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Zimbabwe regarding the payment of pensions to British nationals who have returned from employment in Zimbabwe.

Mrs. Chalker: In line with the provisions of the Zimbabwe constitution, pensions continue to be remitted from Zimbabwe, generally without problem, to British nationals who have returned to the United Kingdom. In a small number of instances where individuals have experienced difficulties, our high commission in Harare has made appropriate representations to the Zimbabwe authorities.

European Convention on Human Rights

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government will now ratify protocols 7 and 8 to the European convention on human rights; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The United Kingdom ratified protocol 8 to the European convention on human rights in April last year. The question of ratification of protocol 7 is under consideration.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Bangladesh

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will provide full details of the overseas aid provided to Bangladesh since 1979, and of each of the projects funded.

Mr. Chris Patten: Total British bilateral aid to Bangladesh since 1979 has been:

	(£ million)
1979	33·821
1980	[1]66·190
1981	33·383
1982	23·537
1983	24·728
1984	35·656
1985	41·173

[1] Includes £31·278 million Debt Relief

The main sectors assisted have been energy, natural resources and communications.

The major projects agreed since 1979 are as follows:

Project title	Year first allocated	Amount of allocation (£ million)
Tea Rehabilitation	1979	20·0
Dhaka Power Distribution (IA)	1982	7·8
Deep Tubewells	1983	15·0
Dhaka Power Distribution (II)	1984	13·3
Rural Development II	1984	6·7
Ashuganj Power Generation	1984	9·5
Gas Development II	1986	25·0
Bridges and Institutional Development	1986	10·3
Population and Family Health	1986	8·0

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Link Project

Mr. D.E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what part he expects the University of Wales and other research establishments in Wales to take in the new link project.

Mr. Butcher: The aim of Link is to accelerate the development of new products and services from scientific and technological research throughout the whole of the United Kingdom. Through Link, the Government will support up to half the costs of collaborative research programmes between the scientific community, and industry and commerce. All United Kingdom institutes of higher education, research establishments and industries are eligible to participate, including those in Wales. The basis for participation would be collaboration in a joint research project involving at least one research establishment and one industrial or commercial partner.

A large number of enquiries concerning Link have already been received by the Link secretariat. Several of these have originated from Welsh organisations. Firm proposals will be expected to go through normal departmental channels as they come forward.

Assisted Areas (Review)

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his time schedule for reviewing the assisted areas of England and Wales; and when he will publish his decisions.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Regional Aid

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will publish a table showing at 1986 prices the value of regional aid grants paid to each region, Scotland and Wales from 1978-79 onwards;

(2) if he will publish a table showing at 1986 prices the value of regional selective aid paid to each region, Scotland and Wales since 1978-79 onwards.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Lloyd's (Report)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how soon after receiving the report by Sir Patrick Neill and his inquiry team into the affairs of Lloyd's he proposes to publish the report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 13 January 1987.

Insider Dealing

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to receive the report of the inspectors appointed to investigate alleged insider dealing in his Department, the Office of Fair Trading and the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a reliable estimate. The investigation is still in progress.

Companies Acts Investigations

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list in the Official Report investigations under the Companies Act initiated in the past 10 years stating (a) the date when inspectors were appointed, (b) the date of any interim report and (c) the date of their final report, if received, to date.

Mr. Howard [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1987]: The following table lists Companies Acts investigations announced since 1 January 1977:

TRANSPORT

Thames Crossing, Dartford

Mr. Anfess asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make further information about the proposed new crossing of the Thames at Dartford available to local residents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A leaflet about the proposed scheme is being distributed this week in the Dartford and Thurrock areas giving details of public exhibitions about this scheme. These will be held in the Orchard Theatre in Dartford on 21 and 22 January and in the Cowdray Hall, West Thurrock on 28 and 29 January. Plans of the proposed new bridge and associated widening of the A282 approach roads will be on display. Staff from the Department of Transport and Dartford River Crossing Ltd. will be present to answer questions. I have arranged for copies of the leaflet to be placed in the Library.

Weighbridges

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Transport if there are plans to site another weighbridge, other than that at Portsmouth ferry port, elsewhere in Portsmouth.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. The existing weighbridge is to be re-sited in a more convenient position.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those lorry weighbridges in the south-east Hampshire area which are self-weigh facilities.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: None of the weighbridges in the area has self-weigh facilities at present.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, following its proposed resiting to the customs area, the weighbridge at Portsmouth ferry port will be available for use by all road hauliers in the area.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: If the Portsmouth Port Authority is prepared to allow road hauliers' vehicles into the ferry port, drivers will be able to take advantage of the self-weigh facility which will be provided when the weighbridge is re-sited.

Railway Lines and Stations (Reinstatement)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has about the lines and stations reinstated by British Rail under the Transport Act 1962 (Amendment) Act 1981 together with those which it is proposed to reinstate in the next 12 months.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand from the British Railways Board that 32 stations and two passenger services have been opened or reopened on an experimental basis under the 1981 Act. A further 11 stations and five passenger services are expected to be opened or reopened in the next 12 months.

British Registered Vessels (Safety Standards)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the adequacy of existing legislation for ensuring that vessels registered in British territories adopt internationally accepted safety standards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Present United Kingdom legislation contains no provision to control the standards adopted by the marine administrations in the British Dependent Territories. For this reason a number of international conventions do not apply to ships registered in some of the dependent territories. The Government recognise that this is not a satisfactoy situation and propose to introduce legislation when the parliamentary time allows to remedy this defect in the law by seeking powers to control the type of ship which can be registered in different territories. In the meantime the Government will continue to provide advice and assistance to marine administrations in dependent territories so that safety standards can be improved and more international conventions extended to them where appropriate.

Roadbuilding Materials

Mr. Neale asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he takes to monitor the performance of materials used in the construction of motorways and trunk roads to ensure specifications are producing the required result.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department's engineers are closely involved with the construction and maintenance of motorways and trunk roads and monitor the performance of in-service roads. When a problem with a material is encountered on any site, the performance of that material on other sites is investigated and corrective action taken if required; consideration is also given to the need to revise any standards or specifications.

Inland Waterways (Carriage of Fuel)

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration his Department has given to altering regulations about the carriage of fuel in respect of carriage on inland waterways.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: None, but if the hon. Member has a particular problem in mind, he may care to write to me.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Warnock Report (Consultation Document)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost of production and circulation of the recent consultation document produced by his Department on the issues raised by the Warnock report; how many copies have so far been printed; and what is the total anticipated print run.

Mr. Brooke: The printing and distribution costs were borne by Her Majesty's Stationery Office, with recovery in the usual way from the proceeds of sales. There are some 1,100 copies still in stock out of the total print run of 5,500.

International Banking Supervision

Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has in the light of the Anglo-American pact on banking supervision, about the likelihood of other major banking countries adopting similar requirements with a view to the creation of a system of global banking supervision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The United Kingdom-United States supervisory agreement is an important advance towards establishing common international standards of capital adequacy.

The joint announcement by the Bank of England and the United States Federal banking supervision authorities on 8 January invited comment on a proposed common risk asset ratio (a measure of capital strength relative to the size and risk of a bank's business). The proposed measure incorporates off-balance sheet risks. I am placing a copy of the consultative paper in the Library of the House.

The supervisory agreement has drawn on work done in continuing supervisory discussions in Basle and Brussels, and most recently at the international supervisory conference in Amsterdam. The Bank of England and the United States authorities are discussing their proposals with supervisors in other major banking countries, notably in Europe and Japan, as well as with United Kingdom and United States banks. The Government believe that the United Kingdom-United States agreement will encourage further international co-operation in banking supervision. I understand, however, that it is too early to say what the next steps may be.

DEFENCE

United States Nuclear-powered Warships

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many United States nuclear-powered warships have docked in Portsmouth in the last three years.

Mr. Stanley: Nineteen.

Sports Facilities (Portsmouth)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the costs of the building works for the new swimming pool in Portsmouth for the Royal Navy.

Mr. Freeman: The new swimming pool for the Royal Navy at Portsmouth is being provided at a cost of £450,000.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence if any of the sport facilities in his Department's ownership are available for community use in Portsmouth.

Mr. Freeman: There is extensive community use of Ministry of Defence indoor and outdoor sports facilities in Portsmouth.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the future of the swimming baths at Pitt Street, Portsmouth, which are owned by the Royal Navy.

Mr. Freeman: Consideration is being given to the future of the swimming baths at Pitt Street, Portsmouth when the new swimming pool in HMS Temeraire comes into use.

Procurement Policy

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what arrangements exist to determine the operational requirements of major equipment to be procured for Her Majesty's forces; what person or committee is authorised to determine operational requirements at each stage (a) in concept formulation and in definition of staff target, (b) in feasibility study and in definition of staff requirement, (c) in project definition, if appropriate, and (d) in full development; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what arrangements existed to determine the operational requirements of major equipment to be procured for Her Majesty's forces at the times relevant to determining actions of the operational requirements for demountable rack off-loading pick-up systems; whether these arrangements have since been changed; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will list the dates on which a staff target for demountable rack off-loading pick-up system equipment was either stated or updated; what person or committee was authorised to determine the operational requirements contained in each such staff target, and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he will list the dates on which a staff requirement for demountable rack off-loading pick-up systems equipment was either stated or updated; what person or committee was authorised to determine the operational requirements contained in each such staff requirement; and if he will make a statement;

(5) if he has received any guarantees regarding application of the United States of America Export Administration Act to off set orders in connection with the Boeing air warning aircraft system contract; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987]: An operational requirement for a substantial piece of equipment for the armed forces is expressed as a staff target and subsequently as a staff requirement. Responsibility for formulating operational requirements and sponsoring STs and SRs rests with the Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Systems). STs and SRs involving expenditure above a certain level require endorsement by the equipment policy committee of the Ministry of Defence, whose chairman is the Chief Scientific Adviser. These arrangements have been in force since 2 January 1985 when the reorganisation of the Ministry of Defence took effect. Prior to that date formulation of STs and SRs was the responsibility of the service staffs concerned, and endorsement was required from the operational requirements committee (ORC), whose chairman was the Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Operational Requirements), and subsequently the Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff.

A ST for a demountable rack off-loading and pick-up system (DROPS) was endorsed by the ORC on 24 August 1982. A SR for DROPS was approved by the EPC on 4 July 1985. A first revise of the SR was approved by the EPC on 6 November 1986.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing Statistics

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what was the number and percentage of families living in their own homes (a) in 1979 and (b) now;

(2) what information he has concerning the size and quality of the housing stock in England (a) now and (b) in 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: It is estimated that there were about 18·8 million dwellings in England at the end of September 1986, of which 12·2 million (65 per cent.) were owner-occupied. The corresponding figures for the end of March 1979 were 17·6 million dwellings, of which 10·0 million (57 per cent.) were in owner-occupation.

Reliable information on the quality of the country's housing stock is available only from the quinquennial English "House Condition Surveys": copies of the 1981 report, which also contains results for 1971 and 1976, are available in the Library. Results of the 1986 survey are not yet available.

Since the Government came into office in 1979, the English housing stock has increased by 1·2 million, while owner-occupation has grown by 2·2 million, an unprecedented rate of increase reflecting the success of the right-to-buy scheme. Private spending on maintaining and improving housing has been assisted by the payment of nearly 1·1 million renovation grants, and there have been 600,000 renovations of local authority and new town dwellings.

Housebuilding

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is in a position to estimate the number of new housing starts in 1986.

Mr. Tracey: It is not the practice for the Department to make forecasts of housebuilding starts. Provisional figures for the first 11 months of 1986 were published on 7 January in the Department's press release No. 6, a copy of which is available in the Library. Figures for the whole of 1986 will be released on 5 February.

Construction Industry

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has concerning the total financial contribution of the construction industry to the United Kingdom economy in each year since 1979.

Mr. John Patten: The net output or value added of the construction industry, (as defined by the Standard Industrial Classification which excludes manufacturing) expressed as a proportion of the United Kingdom gross domestic product for the years 1979 to 1985 is shown in the following table.

Year	Percentage GDP
1979	6·3
1980	6·2
1981	6·0
1982	5·9
1983	6·0
1984	6·2
1985	6·1

Further details can be obtained from table 2.1 of "The CSO Blue Book, United Kingdom National Accounts", a copy of which is available in the Library.

Anti-pollution control

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what study he is making of cyanuric acid techniques, developed at the United States Department of Energy's Lawrence Livermore laboratory, as a means of anti-pollution control; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department is following the progress of the experimental work at the Sandia national laboratories in California on the use of cyanuric acid to reduce nitrogen oxides in exhaust gases. First laboratory tests have been promising, but the feasibility of applying the method to practical combustion systems has yet to be demonstrated.

Local Authorities (Capital Receipts)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has allowed any local authority, on application, a relaxation of the right to spend limits on the use of capital receipts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend has no powers to do so.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if any local authorities have used all of their capital receipts received from the sale of a particular asset to pay off immediately the debt charges on that particular asset.

Mr. Chope: Information on this is not collected centrally.

Agricultural Buildings (Planning Controls)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to seek to relax planning controls to allow the re-development of agricultural buildings for use as small industrial units and or housing in green belt areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) set out the Government's policy on the re-use of redundant agricultural buildings in the green belt in answer to a question by the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) on 30 April 1986, at column 414. He said that redundant agricultural buildings can provide very suitable accommodation for small firms and tourist activities, or can be used as individual residences, without detriment to the green belt and to the benefit of the local community, especially where the buildings are of attractive appearance and can be expected with normal repair and maintenance to last for many years. There are no plans to adjust the policy further.

Homelessness

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to combat the rise in homelessness and bad housing conditions; and if he will make a statement on the recent launch of the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless 1987.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987]: Action on these matters is primarily for local authorities.

We are constantly looking at ways of preventing and relieving homelessness. Recent measures include the extra money being put in through housing associations (the Housing Corporation has received an extra £20 million in 1987-88, expected to attract a further £40-45 million private capital) and through our estate action initiative (£1·26 million already allocated this year, with more schemes in the pipeline, specifically for homelessness initiatives on housing estates). Many of the authorities approached are now responding positively to the latter despite a disappointing response from some London boroughs. However, some are still not doing so. Further information was given in my hon. Friend's reply to two debates on 19 December, at columns 1497-1501 and 1536-38.

We have increased the resources available to authorities for investment in housing in 1987-88 by 15 per cent. over 1986-87 plans. And we expect authorities to give the highest priority to renovation of their own stock, too much of which is still lying empty (113,300 dwellings at 1 April 1986). Authorities have a wide range of powers for dealing with poor housing conditions in the private sector both by renovation and by clearance. They will spend more than £500 million on these activities in the private sector this year.

On the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless, I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 9 December to the hon. Members for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) and Knowsley, South (Mr. Hughes).

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy on alleviating homelessness in the light of Professor John Grieve's recent report on homelessness in Greater London, a copy of which has been sent to him; and what is his estimate of the comparative public sector costs of housing homeless families in London by (i) providing them with newly built council dwellings, (ii) providing them with dwellings acquired from the private sector and improved for letting and (iii) providing them with bed and breakfast accommodation.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987]: Prevention of homelessness is a major concern. The reasons why people become homeless vary greatly: for example, changes in family structure, children leaving home earlier, marital disputes and increasing divorce rates. But better understanding of and early advice with family and financial problems can help positively. We also need to make much better use of the housing available. Far too many homes stand empty today in both the public and the private sector.

Once families are accepted as homeless, we advise local authorities to find them permanent accommodation as soon as possible. Sometimes this will be a council house or flat which, if newly built or acquired in Greater London, cost authorities around £7,000 and £5,500 respectively in the first year. This comprises interest on capital, management and maintenance. Sometimes the family will find accommodation in housing association property or elsewhere in the private sector either as tenants or as home owners.

It can be difficult to arrange accommodation at short notice where required by the homelessness legislation without using some form of temporary accommodation, especially where further inquiries are being made and a family has not yet been accepted as homeless. Some London authorities are having to make use of bed-and-breakfast hotels which cost an average of some £30 per household day. Purpose-built or adapted hostels or short life property can provide a much cheaper and a better alternative. We have made it clear to authorities that we are prepared to approve suitable proposals to acquire properties for use as hostels and, though some of the authorities approached are still refusing to bid for these resources, we have launched our estate action initiative to bring empty council dwellings into use for the homeless. The Government are funding a new Housing Corporation programme next year specifically designed to provide better interim accommodation for homeless families. The money for this programme will come from an extra £20 million for the Housing Corporation, which will be complemented by £40 to £45 million of private capital. We have also taken measures recently to stimulate the private rented sector to provide more accommodation and fill empty flats and houses, including an extension of the assured tenancy scheme.

EMPLOYMENT

European Community Social Fund

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Paymaster General what are the conditions for the expenditure of European Community social fund moneys through Manpower Services Commission programmes; and whether there is a guideline from the Directorate General V of the EEC Commission that such funding should be for "bottom up" or local initiatives rather than "top down" initiatives from Government.

Mr. Lee: Manpower Services Commission employment and training programmes which fall within the rules and guidelines of the European social fund are eligible for support from the fund on the same basis as are other applications to it. There is no guideline in the social fund regulations which stipulates that grants for such programmes should be for local initiatives.

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Paymaster General on what basis the decision was taken to introduce the criteria of positive progression into Manpower Services Commission-funded programmes; and whether the introduction of such criteria was agreed by the Commission of the European Communities for Manpower Services Commission projects funded through the Community's social fund.

Mr. Lee: Unfortunately the criteria to which the hon. Member is referring are not readily identifiable from the terms of his question. If he would like to write to me setting out his concerns, I shall of course seek to provide a full reply.

Labour Statistics

Mr. John Fraser asked the Paymaster General if he will provide the numbers employed within the London docklands, together with an analysis of the nature of the occupations currently followed there.

Mr. Lee: Employment statistics for local areas are obtained from the census of employment and the most recent are for September 1981. Local estimates for the September 1984 census are not yet ready. An analysis by occupation is not available but, at September 1981, there were 25,000 employees employed in the area. The figures relates to the area covered by the wards of Custom House and Silvertown, Dockyard, Riverside, Blackwall and Millwall which corresponds most closely to the London docklands.

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Paymaster General what is the number of people living in the Greater London area who have never worked since leaving school.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. On 11 December 1986 there were 36,947 unemployed claimants in Greater London of all ages who had not had a job since leaving full-time education, and of these, 7,115 were aged under 18 years.

Mr. Onslow asked the Paymaster General what is the latest information available to him about the proportion of all those in employment who have two or more jobs; and how this compares with the corresponding figures for each of the five previous years for which the information is available.

Mr. Lee: The latest available estimate of the proportion of persons in employment with a second job comes from the 1985 "Labour Force Survey".

Comparisons with available estimates from previous "Labour Force Surveys" are presented in the following table:

Proportion of persons in employment[1] having a second job
Great Britain

Year	Percentage
1979	1·6
1981	2·1
1983	2·4
1984	3·0
1985	3·3

[1]Estimates relate to the spring of each year. The data for 1983, 1984 and 1985 include persons in Government schemes, whereas 1979 and 1981 only include those on schemes who reported themselves as in employment.

Health and Safety

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Paymaster General (1) what was the last date when discussions about the control of Industrial Major Accidents Hazards Regulations were held with the management of each of the installations which were the subject of investigations into Canvey Island safety in 1978 and subsequently; and what improvements have been made;

(2) if he will list the total amount of hazardous substances currently stored at the high risk installations which were the subject of Health and Safety Executive investigations in 1978 and subsequently;

(3) if he will indicate when the last survey was taken of safety standards at the industrial installations which were the subject of the Canvey Island first, second and third reports and of public inquiries held since 1978; what are the findings; and whether any additional steps have been taken in regard to the safety of these installations.

Mr. Trippier: I shall write shortly to my right hon. Friend and place a copy of my letter in the House Library.

Isle of Grain (Oil Refinery)

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Paymaster General whether the Health and Safety Executive has been informed of the plans of British Gas to develop a former oil refinery site on the Isle of Grain in conjuction with its existing storage facility there, including any linkage with the Canvey methane terminal on Canvey Island; and what are the implications for the Island's safety from any such linkage.

Mr. Trippier: Yes. In early 1984 the Health and Safety Executive was informed by British Gas of its plan to develop the former Kent oil refinery site on the Isle of Grain and detailed discussions on the proposal have taken place since then and are continuing. The Health and Safety Executive is not aware of any proposed link between the Isle of Grain site and the Canvey methane terminal.

MSC Schemes

Mr. Hancock asked the Paymaster General what information he has as to the proportion of those unemployed, who have completed a Manpower Services Commission scheme, and who were unemployed prior to joining the scheme.

Mr. Lee: No reliable information is available on past participation on Manpower Services Commission schemes by those currently unemployed.

Council of Registration of Gas Installers

Mr. Wainwright asked the Paymaster General when he expects the Health and Safety Executive to issue to the gas industry its proposals for replacing the Council of Registration of Gas Installers.

Mr. Trippier: The Health and Safety Executive hopes to discuss its proposal for a new, independent and representative body to promote gas safety with representatives of all sides of the industry within the next few weeks.

Job Training Scheme

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Paymaster General if, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright), Official Report, 9 December, column 115, he plans to make any changes to arrangements for assessing training allowances for those taking part in the pilots of the new job training scheme.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Changes are being introduced this month which will simplify arrangements for people going on to the scheme.

Under these revised arrangements new trainees will receive a training allowance based on their benefit entitlement and normally this will equal the amount of unemployment benefit last paid or, in the case of those receiving supplementary benefit, a fixed amount below the non-householder scale rate. This will be topped up by a training supplement, where appropriate, to the person's level of benefit entitlement. People getting this training supplement will continue to qualify for single payments, certificated housing benefit and other passported benefits without the need for any special arrangements.

Restart Scheme

Mr. Marlow asked the Paymaster General what are the latest figures, expressed as numbers and percentages by region, for (a) the numbers of Restart letters sent out, (b) the number of second letters sent out, (c) the numbers who have been sent letters out but have not yet attended interviews and (d) the numbers who have left the register (i) without any response to the programme and (ii) subsequent to interview and counselling.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1987, c. 52]: The latest figures are for the period up to 11 December 1986. They are contained in the table. The numbers of those who have ceased to claim benefit include those who cease to do so for reasons unconnected with Restart. We do not know how many people who cease to claim benefit do so because they have found work or training or how many of those did so as a result of Restart.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Welsh Police Officers (Training Courses)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report the number of Welsh police officers serving in Welsh police forces who have been successful since 1971 in gaining a place on the senior command course at the police college, Bramshill.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Since 1971, five police officers from police forces in Wales have been selected for the senior command course at the Police Staff College, including two for the course in 1987. Of these, three officers were born in Wales.

Racial Attacks

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of reported racial attacks in each of the London boroughs during each of the last three years.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a question from the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 4 December 1986, at columns 711-14.

Independent Broadcasting Association Board

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will appoint new members of the Independent Broadcasting Association Board to replace those who have retired.

Mr. Mellor: As soon as possible.

Warning and Monitoring Organisation

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has yet finalised the dates of the United Kingdom's warning and monitoring organisation (UKWMO) exercises for the current year.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The 1987 exercise dates for the United Kingdom warning and monitoring organisation are: 4-5 April, 21 June, 11 October and 1 November.

Animal Procedures Committee

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the names of persons appointed to the Animal Procedures Committee.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Animal Procedures Committee will be appointed shortly and the membership of the committee will be made public.

Manchester (Deputy Chief Constable)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will call for a report from the chief constable of Greater Manchester upon the restrictions placed upon the deputy chief constable of Greater Manchester by the clerk for the Manchester Police Authority on his giving evidence in forthcoming proceedings concerning the chief constable of Greater Manchester and two other senior police officers.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No.

Welsh-English Bilingual Penalty Tickets

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he has given to police forces in Wales on the production of bilingual Welsh-English fixed penalty tickets for motoring offences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have not issued any formal guidance to chief constables of this question, but there was consultation between the Home Office and the Association of Chief Police Officers before implementation of part III of the Transport Act 1982, which had regard to the practical difficulties of producing and using convenient bilingual versions of the form.

Prisoners (Blood Tests)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any prisoners on remand or sentenced are required to submit to blood tests during the course of a medical or other examination.

Mr. Mellor: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Prison Building Projects

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all the proposed new prison projects announced since the beginning of 1984 with the original and revised financial estimates.

Mr. Mellor: The list of new prison building projects added to the programme since 1984, together with the original and latest estimates of cost, is as follows:

	Original/Estimated Cost (September 1986 Prices) £ million	Current Estimate Cost (September 1986 Prices) £ million
Ashford, Surrey	35	35
Doncaster, South Yorks	30	31
Rochdale, Greater Manchester	35	35
Wrexham, Clwyd	30	30
Banstead, Surrey	65	65

Detention Centres

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all detention centre establishments whose designation has changed since the beginning of 1982.

Mr. Mellor: Of those establishments which were designated, in whole or in part, as detention centres on 31 December 1981, the following have been redesignated as youth custody centres; Erlestoke; Guys March; Werrington House; and Campsfield House. Aldington and Send have been redesignated as prisons.

Women Prisoners (Babies)

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state (a) how many women were in custody with their children on the most recent convenient date, (b) in which prisons these women with their children were held, (c) what were the ages of the children and (d) for what offences these mothers had been imprisoned.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987]: On 12 January, 24 women had their babies with them in prison mother and baby units, at Askham Grange, Holloway and Styal.

The ages of the babies were:

Under one month, 7
Aged 2 months, 1
Aged 3 months, 4
Aged 5 months, 1
Aged 6 months, 2
Aged 7 months, 4
Aged 9 months, 3
Aged 11 months, 1
Aged 13 months, 1

One woman was a remand prisoner. Of the other 2 four had been convicted of drugs charges, four f deception and three for robbery. The offences of t remaining 12 were robbery and actual bodily harm trespass and theft; burglary and robbery; handling stole goods; forgery and conspiracy; forgery, fraud, deceptio and handling stolen goods; burglary and arso conspiracy to rob; attempted arson; theft; shoplifting; an actual bodily harm and blackmail.

PRIME MINISTER

Capital Spending Projects

Mr. Hancock asked the Prime Minister how much ha been spent on publicly funded capital spending projects fo each of the last three years.

The Prime Minister: Public sector capital spendin figures for the last three years are as follows:

	£ billio
1984-85 outturn	21·6
1985-86 outturn	21·5
1986-87 estimated outturn	22·5

Source: Table 1.14, "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1987-88 to 1989-90" (Cm. 56-I).

NORTHERN IRELAND

Licensing Hours

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many representations he has received from residents of Northern Ireland concerning proposals to extend licensing hours; and how many of these representations have been (a) broadly in favour of the extension of such hours and (b) opposed thereto.

Mr. Needham: I have received 26,904 letters from members of the public and organisations concerning the Government's proposals to extend licensing hours in Northern Ireland. Of these, 16,461 were in favour of and 10,443 were opposed to the proposals. I have also received petitions from the Presbyterian and Free Presbyterian Churches containing 25,935 and 23,594 signatures respectively opposing the proposals.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make it his policy that measures which he proposes on licensing hours in Northern Ireland should be in accordance with the wishes of the majority of the people in Northern Ireland, and to consult with hon. Members representing constituencies in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: I shall consider carefully the view of all those who have commented on the Government's proposals for changes in the licensing hours as they apply to licensed premises and registered clubs in decid·ng the contents of the draft legislation which Parliament will be asked to approve later this year. I shall also take account of the representations which the Government have received since publication of the Blackburn report in 1979, as well as the findings of attitudes surveys conducted by the Government in 1978 and 1984. Additionally, I shall have regard to other important considerations, including the unsatisfactory state of the existing law, the problems of enforcement, and of course, the implications for the health of the community.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether it is his intention to proceed with proposals to extend licensing hours in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: I am at present considering the representations received from members of the public, churches, and other organisations. I shall take all the views expressed fully into account when deciding what changes, if any, should be made to the published proposals.

Mahgaberry Prison

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what are the current male and female populations of Mahgaberry prison in Northern Ireland; and what is the certified normal accommodation;

(2) whether there are any plans to allocate additional prisoners to Mahgaberry prison during 1987; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what was the cost of building and other alterations to Mahgaberry prison during 1986; and what are the estimated costs for building and other alterations in 1987.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Further Education (Disabled People)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of the students attending colleges of further education in (a) England, (b) Wales and (c) England and Wales are registered disabled.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information is not collected centrally on a routine basis. However, in 1985 a survey of students with special educational needs was carried out, covering public sector higher education and non-advanced further education in England. The survey estimated that some 18,000 of the students attending courses at colleges of further and higher education had special educational needs which required additional support or equipment. This represents about 0·9 per cent. of students in public sector further and higher education. In addition some 26,000 students from other institutions were receiving tuition from FE college staff under link or outreach arrangements.

Information for Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Medical Research Council

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report the size of the Medical Research Council budget for the current financial year.

Mr. Dunn: The Medical Research Council budget for 1986-87 is made up of the grant-in-aid from the science budget of £128·3 million, plus a further £8·3 million received mainly from other Government Departments, industry, international organisations, local government authorities, other research councils and charities.

Local Education Authorities (Capital Allocations)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether it is the Government's intention to include any new schemes in the capital allocations for buildings in the local authority sector of higher education for (a) 1987-88 and (b) 1988-89.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: It was not possible to make any allocations for major new building work in local authority higher education in 1987-88. In making allocations for new capital projects by local education authorities I had to give priority to projects to provide new school places in areas of population growth and to work arising from statutory proposals to remove surplus school places. After taking account also of local education authorities' contractual commitments I had little remaining to allocate either for much needed improvement work in schools or for other capital expenditure in further and higher education. However, with the total spending power available to authorities from allocations and capital receipts and the freedom they enjoy to vire within their total of prescribed expenditure between and within services, some authorities may decide nevertheless to start work on major building schemes in their higher education institutions. It is too early at this stage to predict whether, and, if so, at what level, it will be possible to make allocations for major new building work in local authority higher education in 1988-89.

Grammar Schools

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy towards the retention of the remaining grammar schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The draft circular "Providing for Quality", issued for consultation in August 1986, makes it clear that in exercising his statutory duty to consider on their individual merits proposals for the reorganisation of schools the holder of my office will have regard, inter alia, to parental preference for retention of grammar schools and to whether the established quality of the school was likely to be sustained. He would normally approve the closure of a school only if he were satisfied both that it was unlikely to be able to sustain its established quality and that the alternative provision would be better.

Private Schools

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy towards the maintenance of charitable status for private schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The independent sector's contribution continues to enrich the education system and the Government are committed to preserving and fostering it. We have no plans to remove charitable status from those schools which enjoy it.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Resettlement Unit (Merseyside)

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why Knowsley borough council's proposals concerning the resettlement unit at Field Lane, Fazakerley, were rejected; and what account was taken of the recommendations by the review body set up on Merseyside.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has for the resettlement unit in Merseyside; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lyell: All 22 DHSS-run resettlement units, including that at Fazakerley, Liverpool are to be closed. They will be replaced by groups of smaller hostels, run by local agencies, voluntary and local authority, and funded by the Department. The proposal by the Liverpool review team that the existing unit at Fazakerley should simply be taken over by Knowsley borough council did not offer the kind of improved provision envisaged, and the review team has therefore been asked to reconsider.

AIDS

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report those institutions which are recieving funds from his Department for AIDS-related research, together with the magnitude of those funds.

Mr. Newton: Funding for AIDS research currently supported by the Department has been allocated to the following research institutions:

Location	Estimated total cost £
i. University College Hospital, London	39,500
ii. University College, Cardiff	136,700
iii. Middlesex Hospital Medical School, London	45,000

Additionally, the Department is contributing to:

(a) The Medical Research Council, for epidemiological studies and for the United Kingdom Centre for Co-ordinating Epidemiological Research on AIDS: up to £250,000 per annum.

(b) The National Institute for Biological Standards and Control: £60,000 in 1986-87.

(c) The Public Health Laboratory Services Board: expenditure on research including some service elements was £740,000 in 1986-87 plus a further £500,000 mainly for screening.

(d) The National Blood Transfusion Service (with the Middlesex hospital medical school): £82,000 on two research studies.

Research on AIDS in the United Kingdom is co-ordinated by the Medical Research Council, which receives its grant-in-aid from the science budget of the Department of Education and Science. On 18 December 1986 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science announced the addition of £1 million a year to the council's grant for the purposes of AIDS research.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice he has received as to whether heat treatment of blood and blood products, respectively, destroys HIV (a) before and (b) after it can be identified; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is now in a position to guarantee that (a) blood products, including factor 8, and (b) whole blood, supplied through the national blood transfusion service is totally free of the AIDS virus; if he is in a position to give a guarantee that no patient receiving such supplies will contract the AIDS virus in this way; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The safety of the blood supply in this country is maintained in two ways. First, all potential donors are given a leaflet which asks those who are at risk of AIDS not to give blood. Secondly, all blood donations are tested for evidence of infection.

These precautions reduce the chance of a unit of blood being infected and failing to be detected to about one in a million.

Whole blood or red cells cannot be heat treated when used for blood transfusions, but those blood products for which transmission of HIV has been established are given a heat treatment to inactivate the virus.

Evidence suggests that the heat treatment currently used by manufacturers of blood products made from blood plasma will inactivate any HIV present, even if HIV antibodies had not been identified in the blood donation from which it was obtained.

Sir Philip Goodhart asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment his Department has made of the adequacy of its resources to screen for AIDS students coming to the United Kingdom from Africa, America and the middle east; and what estimate he has made of the cost of providing that screening.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 9 December 1986, c. 122-23]: The cost of such arrangements would vary considerably according to a number of factors, including the country in which the screening was carried out. We would not expect resources to be an inhibiting factor, should such a policy be considered appropriate.

Mr. K. T. Runfitt

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why Mr. K. T. Runfitt of flat 2, 26-28 Osborne road, Southsea, whose case is the subject of a letter from the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South, dated 8 November 1986, has not received replies to his four letters to his Department.

Mr. Lyell: The case to which the hon. Member refers is complex and required advice from the chief adjudication officer. The advice has now been received and the Department will be writing to Mr. Runfitt as soon as possible.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in how many areas the severe weather payments have come into effect this winter so far.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) on 13 January, at column 132.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any plans to draw attention in the Leeds metropolitan district council area to the availability of severe weather payments for those in receipt of supplementary benefit.

Mr. Major: Advertisements about exceptionally cold weather payments have been placed in the Yorkshire Post and Yorkshire Evening Post, which cover this area, and they will appear today. Articles about the scheme will appear in other local papers this week.

The regional information officer has been interviewed on local radio and has appeared on Yorkshire TV.

Advertisements will appear in the national press today and on commercial radio throughout the country.

Posters and leaflets have been issued to all of the Department's local offices, including the five offices serving this area.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people over retirement age received severe weather payments in the Leeds metropolitan district council area in 1984, 1985 and 1986; and what was the total cost of those payments for each year.

Mr. Major: Information on exceptionally severe weather payments is not collected by category of claimant. The total number and cost of payments made by the local offices which deal with the Leeds metropolitan district council area are as follows:

Year	Number of payments	Total cost £
1984	None	Nil
1985	4,104	50,617
1986	13,608	219,284

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give (a) the minimum night temperature, (b) the daily mean temperature, (c) the weekly mean temperature for each of the weather stations used for calculating severe weather payments for the week 5 January to 11 January inclusive.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, if he will list, for the week 5 January to 11 January, the average daily temperatures for each weather station designated for measuring temperatures for exceptionally severe weather payments; and what was the lowest recorded temperature for each station during that week.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his replies, 13 January 1987 and 15 January 1987]: The following table gives the information on daily and weekly mean temperatures for the week 5 January 1987 to 11 January 1987 inclusive. I shall let the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) have information on minimum night temperatures very shortly.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost of paying £5 per week extra heating allowance to all current qualifiers for heating allowance from December to March, inclusive; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: About 2,830,000[1] supplementary benefit claimants were in receipt of a weekly heating addition in 1984-85, the latest year for which information is available. If a £5 per week extra heating allowance was paid for a 17 week period from December to March inclusive, the cost would be around £240 million.

[1] Source: "Annual Statistical Enquiry 1984".

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the severe weather payment for the week commencing Monday 12 January will be paid to the recipients.

Mr. Major: The Department's local offices have been instructed to give priority to exceptionally cold weather payments; to deal with claims for week commencing 12 January 1987 immediately on their receipt and to make payments as soon as the claim has been determined.

Doctors (Prescribing Practice)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on how many occasions in the last two years action has been taken against doctors who habitually misprescribe, or oversubscribe, drugs.

Mr. Newton: In 1984 and 1985, the latest years for which figures are available, doctors of the Department's regional medical service made 177 and 236 visits respectively to practices where prescribing costs were more than 25 per cent. above the average of colleagues in their family practitioner committee area. During these visits advice on how to modify prescribing habits without detriment to patient care was given to 371 and 462 general medical practitioners respectively.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department has powers under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 to prohibit, by direction, a practitioner whom he finds has been prescribing controlled drugs in an irresponsible manner from prescribing some or all controlled drugs. Two such directions were made in respect of doctors in 1984, two in 1985 and three in 1986.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people over retirement age in the Leeds metropolitan district council area were in receipt of supplementary benefit in 1984, 1985 and at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Lyell: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Slimming Aids and Prophylactics

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the figures of net expenditure on slimming aids and prophylactics, respectively, provided by the National Health Service for the last four complete years for which figures are available.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Kidney Transplants

Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give (a) the number of patients on the high priority waiting list for kidney transplants in May 1986 and (b) the number of patients on that list who have since been found matching kidneys for transplant.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Raynsford asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing the total number and percentage of all (a) local authority tenants and (b) private tenants in Great Britain receiving means-tested housing assistance, including housing benefit, rent rebates, rent allowance and supplementary benefit, in each of the years from 1979 to 1986, the total cost of such payments and the average payment per recipient.

Mr. Lyell [pursuant to his reply, 3 December 1986, c. 693-94]: The information requested is given in the following tables, which combine information from different sources before and after the introduction of housing benefit in 1982-83.

Table 1
Rent rebate and supplementary benefit equivalent to local authority and new town corporation tenants (Great Britain)

Year	Average number of Recipients (000)'s	Percentage of all LA Dwellings	Total Expenditure £'s (million)	Average Amount £'s per week
1979-80	2,650	40	630	4·60
1980-81	2,480	44	840	5·70
1981-82	3,350	52	1,310	7·50
1982-83	3,580	57	1,750	9·40
1983-84	3,780	61	1,980	10·10
1984-85	3,790	63	2,150	10·90
1985-86	3,860	63	2,290	11·40
1986-87	3,745	63	2,418	12·40

Notes:
1. The percentage of all LA dwellings is calculated using information on dwelling stock which includes vacant properties.
2. The figure for 1986-87 has been calculated using information on 1985 dwelling stock.
3. Estimates for 1986-87 are highly provisional and are subject to revision. Those for earlier years may be subject to minor revision.

Table 2
Rent allowance and supplementary benefit equivalent to private sector tenants (Great Britain)

Year	Average number of recipients	Percentage of all private tenants	Total expenditure	Average amount
	000's		£ million	£ per week
1979-80	700	26	160	4·30
1980-81	710	27	190	5·10
1981-82	800	31	280	6·60
1982-83	840	33	380	8·70
1983-84	1,020	41	540	10·20
1984-85	1,120	46	670	11·50
1985-86	1,160	49	780	12·90
1986-87	1,190	50	1,016	16·40

Notes
1. The percentage of all private tenants is calculated using information on dwelling stock which includes vacant properties and properties where there are "nil" rents (these tenants would not be eligible for housing benefit). It also includes as one dwelling multi-occupied properties with shared facilities where there may potentially be more than one housing benefit claimant.
2. The figure for 1986-87 percentage of all private tenants has been calculated using information on 1985 dwelling stock.
3. Estimates for 1986-87 are highly provisional and are subject to revision. Those for earlier years may be subject to minor revision.

Hearing Aids

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why there is a shortage of supplies in hearing aid centres of National Health Service aids in the BE30's range; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987]: I understand that there is no shortage of supplies of the BE30's range of hearing aids in the National Health Service. If, however, the hon. Member knows of a particular supply difficulty locally he may wish to contact the chairman of Mersey regional health authority, which has responsibility for the supply of National Health Service hearing aids.

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if, pursuant to the reply to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe on 18 December, Official Report, column 705, a person will be eligible for the severe disability premium if he uses that premium to meet the expenses of a volunteer living with him who is not under the auspices of a voluntary organisation;

(2) if, pursuant to the reply to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe on 18 December, Official Report, column 705, a person will be eligible for the severe disability premium if he uses that premium to pay for a person to live with him in order to provide the assistance he requires.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987]: A person, other than a volunteer employed by a charitable or other organisation (except a local authority), who provides care for a severely disabled person would be entitled to claim invalid care allowance subject to the normal qualifying conditions for that benefit. Among other conditions, the severe disability premium would not be paid where invalid care allowance was in payment.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to the reply to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshaw on 18 December, Official Report, column 705, he will state what information he has on the range of charges currently being made by voluntary organisations providing volunteers to live with severely disabled people.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987]: The Department does not maintain information of this kind. I understand, however, that the independent living scheme organised by Community Service Volunteers to help severely disabled people in their homes charges project sponsors a placement fee of £68 a month for each volunteer. In addition, a development fee of £100 is payable by new projects on receipt of application. A variable boarding and food allowance is payable and each volunteer receives a personal payment of £15·25 a week.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to the reply to the right hon.

Member for Manchester, Wythenshaw on 18 December, Official Report, column 705, he will state what is the number of the estimated 7,000 recipients of the severe disability premium who will be in receipt of the higher rate of attendance allowance.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987]: The available data do not enable reliable separate estimates to be made between those receiving the higher and lower rates of attendance allowance.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) why he has decided to offer the severe disability premium only to disabled people who live alone and are in receipt of attendance allowance but who are not cared for by a person claiming invalid care allowance;

(2) on what basis it has been decided that disabled people who are cared for by someone in receipt of invalid care allowance should not qualify for the severe disability premium and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 13 January 1987]: The severe disability premium is intended to give help to severely disabled people who live independently in the community and who have no one to look after them. It is consistent with that aim that those who are looked after by someone receiving invalid care allowance should not be eligible for the premium.

Benefits

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the numbers who claim (a) unemployment benefit and (b) supplementary benefit as unemployed claimants; what are the total numbers who are dependent on these claimants; what are the total yearly amounts paid in unemployment benefit and supplementary benefit for the unemployed; and if he will publish these figures also on a regional basis.

Mr. Lyell [pursuant to his reply, 1 December 1986, c. 535]: The available information is given in the tables.

[2] A regional breakdown of supplementary benefit expenditure to the unemployed is not available.
[3] Figures are rounded to the nearest 100 and may, therefore, appear not to add.

The number of dependants was 150,200 for unemployment benefit claimants of whom 73,800 were also receiving supplementary benefit (at May 1986) and 1,306,000 for supplementary benefit claimants (at December 1984). In unemployment benefit cases the figure is for adult dependants only because there are no dependancy benefits for children. In supplementary benefit cases adult dependants and children are included. A regional breakdown for these figures is available only for supplementary benefit cases and is as shown in the following table.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Intervention Stores

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what was the level of butter stored in intervention, and where it was stored in north Yorkshire, on the latest available date; and what was the comparable figure on the same date in 1979, 1984 and 1985, respectively;

(2) what was the level of grain stored in intervention, and where it was stored, in north Yorkshire, on the latest available date; and what was the comparable figure on the same date in 1979, 1984 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Gummer: The following stocks of intervention butter and grain were stored in north Yorkshire on 1 January 1987. The stocks at the beginning of 1984 and 1985 were given on 29 January 1986, at column 537. Records of storage locations in 1979 are no longer available.

Timber

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received in favour of treating timber as an agricultural crop.

Mr. Donald Thompson: In appropriate circumstances farm woodland is capable of making a useful contribution to farm income. I have received a number of representations from various organisations urging further encouragement for the planting of new woodland on farms and the better management of existing woodland.

Agricultural Expenditure

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what savings will be produced in 1987 and 1988, respectively, by the Agriculture Ministers' agreement of December.

Mr. Jopling: The Commission has estimated that the package of measures on milk, beef and green rates will reduce Community expenditure by about 940 mecu in 1987 and 330 mecu in 1988.

Alternative Land Use

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will place the report of the alternative land use in the rural environment (ALURE) working party in the Library.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soo as possible.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Visits (Judges)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy of his Department on visits to prisons by judges; and what guidelines he issues on how often such visits should take place.

Mr. Mellor: The Department welcomes visits by judges to penal establishments. The frequency of such visits is not a matter for us but I understand that all newly appointed assistant recorders are required by the Lord Chancellor to visit at least two establishments before they sit judicially. The Judicial Studies Board encourages all experienced judges and recorders to visit penal establishments from time to time.

Custodial Sentences

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the present number of (a) men and (b) women serving custodial sentences and who are under (i) 21, (ii) 25 and (iii) 30 years of age.

Mr. Mellor: The information is given in the table.

Population under sentence[1] in Prison Department establishments in England and Wales on 30 November 1986: by age and sex

[2]Number

Age in years	Males	Females
14 to 20	8,510	220
21 to 24	8,310	280
25 to 29	6,720	260
14 to 29	23,530	750

[1]Including persons committed in default of payment of a fine.
[2]Rounded estimates: detailed checking of individual cases would involve disproportionate cost.

Rape

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of reported cases of rape in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: Numbers of offences of rape recorded by the police in England and Wales in the years 1975 to 1985 are published in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1985" (Cmnd. 10, table 2.9). Part of the increase in 1985 was due to changes in police recording practice.

Car Thefts

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of cars stolen in Greater London in each of the last three years.

Mr. Mellor: The number of offences of theft or unauthorised taking of motor vehicles recorded by the Metropolitan police and the City of London police was 86,900 in 1983; 88,000 in 1984; and 88,500 in 1985. These figures are published each year, by police force area in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables Volume 3". (Table S.3.1 of the 1985 issue.)

Repatriation

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the numbers of people assisted by Her Majesty's Government with voluntary repatriation, including their families, since 1970, together with the annual aggregate financial assistance provided.

Mr. Waddington: The principal scheme for assisting people to return permanently to an overseas country is operated under section 29 of the Immigration Act 1971 on behalf of the Government by International Social Services Great Britain Ltd. A separate facility with different conditions of eligibility is offered by the Department of Health and Social Security under the supplementary benefit scheme. The available information about the assistance provided under each scheme is as follows:

Pedestrian Crossings

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends to introduce legislation to present more severe penalties in cases where pedestrians on pedestrian crossings are put at risk by drivers of motor vehicles.

Mr. Mellor: The road traffic law review which was set up by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is examining the scope and definition of road traffic offences and the penalties available. We shall give its recommendations careful consideration when it reports later in the year.

Electoral Areas

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the division of the parishes of Birchwood and Croft into electoral divisions will take place.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have received a report from the Local Government Boundary Commission for England of a further electoral review of the borough of Warrington. This includes a proposal to divide the wards of what is now the single parish of Birchwood and Croft between three district wards. We shall decide whether to make an order giving effect to the commission's proposals as soon as possible after the expiry of the statutory period for representations on 28 January 1987. In view of the number of reports submitted in the last few weeks by the Local Government Boundary Commissions for England and Wales, I cannot at present say when an order relating to Warrington is likely to be made.

Television Reception

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those areas which have been provided with free additional equipment to improve television reception, with his estimate of the number of persons who have thus been assisted in each case.

Mr. Mellor: None. Licences under the Wireless Telegraphy Act 1949 to install transmitting equipment to improve television reception have always been issued on the basis that the licensee would be responsible for obtaining the equipment conforming with the terms of the licence. About 200 such licences have so far been issued. The number of individuals assisted in each case has varied considerably from case to case, but in all about 15,000 people have benefited. If the hon. Member would like details of the schemes for which licences have been issued, I shall be happy to write to him.

Bus and Coach Drivers (Prosecutions)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report the cumulative total of bus and coach drivers successfully prosecuted for exceeding the 70 mph speed limit on Britain's motorways in each of the past five years.

Mr. Mellor: No reliable information is available for specific types of vehicle. The available information relates to total findings of guilt in magistrates' courts for exceeding 70 mph limits on motorways and is published annually in "Offences Relating to Motor Vehicles, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables" (table 5 of the issue for 1985), copies of which are in the Library.

Myra Hindley

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects an accurate costing for the visit of Myra Hindley to Saddleworth Moor to become available.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the chief constable of the Greater Manchester police that the additional cost to the police service of Myra Hindley's visit to Saddleworth Moor was £12,000.

Nuclear Safety

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Avon and Somerset as to what items of equipment relevant to an incident involving radioactivity are available from stores located in Avon and Somerset for use by police of the Avon and Somerset constabulary; what number of (a) personal dosimeters, (b) other radiation meters, (c) sets of protective clothing and (d) breathing units, are available from such stores; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Avon and Somerset as to what training facilities are used by the Avon and Somerset constabulary for couses in dealing with incidents involving radioactivity; what number of officers have attended such courses in each of the last five years; what training is given in the use of relevant equipment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Philippine Citizens (Admissions)

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes there have been in the rules for admitting Philippine citizens to the United Kingdom for permanent and temporary work and for the admittance of their dependants, respectively, over the past 10 years.

Mr. Waddington: There are no rules relating specifically to nationals of the Philippines and those seeking admission to the United Kingdom must qualify under the relevant provisions of the immigration rules (currently HC 169, as amended). Throughout the last 10 years, overseas nationals wishing to work here have generally required work permits. The criteria for the issue of work permits were changed in 1980 and permits are now only available for jobs requiring a high level of skill or experience for which no labour is available within the European Community.

Prison Chapels

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Leicester, East of 14 January, if he will list those prison chapels which are used as cinemas.

Mr. Mellor: The prison chapels used as cinemas are the following:

Pentonville
Winchester
Birmingham
Stafford
Gloucester
Manchester
Liverpool
Leeds
Lincoln

Bail Applications

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of bail applications which have been refused during the years 1983, 1984 and 1985; how many bail applications for scheduled offences have been granted for the same years; and how many of those granted bail did not comply with its conditions during the same years.

Mr. Mellor: Not all the information requested is available. The number of persons remanded on bail and the number remanded in custody is published, for each offence group, in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" (chapter 8 of the issue for 1985, Cmnd. 10) No information is collected centrally on the number of persons who do not comply with conditions of their bail.

Bilingual Fixed Penalty Tickets

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether police forces in Wales are authorised to produce fixed penalty tickets in a bilingual, Welsh/English format.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There is nothing in law to prevent the police from producing and issuing bilingual fixed penalty notices, but in the light of the practical difficulties that would result for the administration of the new fixed penalty system, no police force at present does so.

Heysel Stadium Disaster

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in view of the economic circumstances of many of the defendants, he will consider making an order directing that the extradition proceedings in connection with the Heysel stadium disaster be heard before a stipendiary magistrate sitting in Liverpool.

Mr. Mellor: The Extradition Acts 1870 and 1895 provide that extradition proceedings must be held before the Bow street magistrate except where it would be dangerous to the life of the accused or prejudicial to his health to move him to Bow street. We are, however, considering the suggestion made by the hon. Member, and will write to him.

Metropolitan Police Area (Crime Statistics)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many crimes in total, and how many crimes of violence were committed in each district of the Metropolitan Police in 1978 and in each year since;

(2) how many burglaries were committed in each district of the Metropolitan Police in 1978 and in each year since.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987, c. 75]: Total notifiable offences recorded by the police in each London borough in the years 1978 and 1980-83 are published in each "Annual Abstract of Greater London Statistics: 1983-84, Volume 16" (Table 147), a copy of which is the Library. Recently more detailed figures, including those for violence against the person, burglary and other main offence groups have been placed in the Library and I will arrange for further tables to be added to extend the series back to 1982. More detailed information for earlier years can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, (1) how many murders were committed in each district of the Metropolitan Police in 1978 and in each year since;

(2) how many murders were cleared up by the Metropolitan Police in 1978 and each year since; and what percentage this represents of total murders in their area.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 12 January, c. 75]: In the absence of a court decision, it is not always possible to distinguish offences of murder, manslaughter and infanticide; they are collectively known as homicide. Numbers of offences of homicide recorded and cleared up by the Metropolitan police are published each year in the annual "Report of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis" (appendix 4(ii) of the report for 1985, Cmnd. 9790). A breakdown of the recorded homicides by district would be available only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were cautioned formally for sexual offences (a) in each Metropolitan police district and (b) in the Metropolitan police area in 1978 and in each year since.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [pursuant to his reply, 12 January 1987, c. 75]: Information about cautions by police force area and offence group is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" [table 35(a) for 1978; table 34(a) for 1979; and table 3.7A of vol 3 of the supplementary tables from 1980.] Details of cautioning by district could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Prison Sentences

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report such information as is available to show the average sentence given, and the actual sentence served, for (a) rape and (b) attempted rape, (c) manslaughter, (d) occasioning grievous bodily harm and (e) murder in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 8 December 1986, Vol. 107, c. 80]: The readily available information is given in the table. Information for all years could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The comparison between the sentence served and the sentence imposed can only be made on discharge; thus the sentence lengths reflect sentencing decisions taken in previous years. Information on sentencing in each year is to be found in "Criminal Statistics" (chapter 7 of the Command Paper and supplementary volumes 1 and 2).

The average time served under sentence is reduced by time spent on remand, remission and parole. Changes during this period included a significant increase in the average time spent on remand, a reduction in the minimum qualifying period for parole (affecting mainly sentences under 3 years), and a more restricted policy on parole for those serving sentences of over 5 years for offences of violence. Also between 1980 and 1985 both the average sentence length and the average time spent under sentence were reduced by the changes in the sentencing structure for young offenders which came into effect in May 1983. Under the Sexual Offences Act 1985 the maximum sentence for attempted rape was increased to life imprisonment.

The average time served by those released on licence from life sentences does not fully reflect the longest periods likely to be served by some of those given life sentences following the abolition of capital punishment in 1965 who have not yet been released. Fuller information on the time served by all persons received under life sentences is given in table 4(e) of "Prison Statistics England and Wales 1985", (Cmnd. 9903). In accordance with the statement made by the then Home Secretary in November 1983, offenders convicted of the most heinous murders can normally expect to serve at least 20 years in custody, and there will be cases where the gravity of the offence requires a still longer period to be served.

Welsh Prisoners

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy that every prisoner whose home is in Wales may be held within a prison in Wales if he or she so wishes.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1986, Vol. 1, c. 734]: The only accommodation presently available for male offenders in Wales is in Cardiff and Swansea prisons, and these are already fully committed as local prisons for male adults serving the courts in south and mid-Wales. There are also two male young offender establishments, Usk and Prescoed camp, in Wales and we try to accommodate Welsh young offenders in them if their home is nearby. There is no facilty for female prisoners to be held in Wales.

Nuclear Accidents

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on Government policy relating to the level of funds available to meet third party claims for damages resulting from a nuclear accident.

Mr. Goodlad: I have been asked to reply.

The Nuclear Installations Act 1965, as amended, provides, in the first instance, for funds up to the sterling equivalent of 300 million SDR (currently about £250 million) to be available to satisfy compensation claims in the event of a nuclear accident. Beyond that, the Act provides that claims shall be satisfied to such extent and out of funds provided by such means as Parliament may determine.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Irish Republic (Agreements)

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, during the negotiation of the Anglo-Irish Agreement or in the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference, or in any other exchanges with the Government of the Irish Republic, Her Majesty's Government requested re-affirmation, or classification, of the supplementary agreement fixing the area of Northern Ireland and continued by the Ireland (Confirmation of Agreement) Act 1925, following the Tripartite Agreement between the Governments of the Irish Free State and Northern Ireland and His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom; and what conversations have occurred between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Irish Republic on the international status and continuing validity of the said agreement and legislation.

Mr. Eggar: The question of the 1925 boundary agreement or the Ireland (Confirmation of Agreement) Act 1925 which gave it legislative confirmation, did not arise in the negotiations leading to the Anglo-Irish Agreement; nor have there been any recent conversations about it with the Government of the Republic of Ireland.

Helsinki Final Act

Mr. Knowles asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 19 December, Official Report, column 760, when he expects the current examination by the Conference for Security and Co-operation in Europe follow-up meeting in Vienna of the record of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Eastern European countries in implementing the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act to be completed.

Mr. Renton: The Vienna CSCE follow-up meeting reconvenes on 27 January. The formal exchange of views on implementation of the Helsinki Final Act is scheduled to end at the beginning of February. However, the United Kingdom delegation will be able at any stage of the meeting to raise specific aspects of the performance of the Soviet Union and eastern European countries which are of concern.

Gibraltar

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement about his recent discussions with the Spanish Foreign Minister in respect of Gibraltar.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend met the Spanish Foreign Minister in London on 13 and 14 January. Their meeting was part of the process of co-operation and negotiation between Britain and Spain, started by the Brussels Agreement of 27 November 1984. My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State and the Chief Minister of Gibraltar, Sir Joshua Hassan, were also present as members of the British delegation.

The Foreign Ministers reviewed progress in co-operation between Gibraltar and Spain. They agreed that it should continue to take place on a fair and balanced basis, consistent with their common Community obligations. They noted that contacts had developed satisfactorily in a number of fields including tourism, the environment, culture and sport, public health and education. They agreed that the creation of economic and cultural working groups was desirable subject to terms of reference being agreed. Officials were instructed to pursue this.

The two Ministers also discussed co-operation in the civil use of Gibraltar airport and instructed officials to resume their study of the matter.

As provided for in the Brussels agreement, there was a full discussion of sovereignty. Snr. Fernandez Ordonez underlined the importance of proposals put forward by Spain in February 1985. My right hon. and learned Friend reaffirmed our commitment to honour the wishes of the people of Gibraltar, as set out in the preamble of their 1969 Constitution. He stressed the importance of managing any differences between Britain and Spain in a spirit consistent with their links of traditional friendship and their common membership of the European Community and NATO.

The two Ministers agreed to meet again in Madrid in accordance with the pattern already established.

ENVIRONMENT

Tobacco Industry (Sports Sponsorship)

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has now concluded the negotiations between himself and the tobacco industry on the sponsorship of sport and sporting events; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: I am pleased to announce that the negotiations have been completed and the Government have reached a new voluntary agreement with the tobacco industry on sports sponsorship in the United Kingdom. The agreement came into effect today and will run until at least 31 October 1989.

The effect of the new agreement is that: overall expenditure on sponsorship activities will be reduced; the companies will not sponsor events designed to appeal mainly to spectators under 18 years old; media advertising will not depict any participants in a sport; the size of health warnings on signs at televised events will be increased by 50 per cent.; there will be tighter controls over the siting of signs at televised events; the agreement will be monitored by the Committee for Monitoring Agreements on Tobacco Advertising and Sponsorship, which is chaired by Sir Peter Lazarus.

These provisions have been incorporated into the detailed text of an agreement, copies of which are being placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The Government are grateful to the tobacco companies for the way in which they have pursued the negotiations and for accepting more specific controls over their sponsorship activities, particularly where the event concerned is to be televised.

London Docklands

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many homes are currently for sale within the London docklands which have been developed on sites provided by the corporation at prices (a) below £50,000, (b) between £50,000 and £100,000 and (c) above £100,000.

Mr. John Patten: I will write to the hon. Member.

Housing

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the number of tenancies currently existing which fall within the provisions of the Rent Act 1957.

Mr. John Patten: I will write to my hon. Friend.

Council Tenants

Mr. Garrett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will increase the compensation payments to council tenants who are compulsorily transferred to another council tenancy.

Mr. Tracey: My right hon. Friend has at present no plans to do so.

Big Ben

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the effects of the recent cold weather on the operation of Big Ben.

Mr. Chope: On 12 and 13 January the cold weather caused a problem with the chimes of the Great Clock. The normally flexible pads, which regulate the strength of the strike of the bell hammers, became hardened in the extremely low temperatures in the belfry. This affected the hour striking bell, Big Ben, and also one of the quarter-chiming bells. These failed to sound on a number of occasions, the hardened pads preventing the hammers making contact with the bells.

A method has been found of warming the pads sufficiently to restore their flexibility and all the bells are now producing their familiar sound.

Grant-related Expenditure

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the number of local authorities receiving grant-related expenditure on the criterion that an airport is situated in their area.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment intends that, for the 1987-88 rate support grant settlement, 30 local authorities will receive grant-related expenditure for debt charges retained by local authorities where airport companies are established under the Airports Act 1986. Estimates of the debt charges remaining, totalling £9·9 million, are as follows:

Local Authority	Airports Debt Charges GRE (£ Million)
Luton	1·067

Local Authorities (Development Proposals)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the incidence of local authorities giving themselves planning permission for a housing development prior to holding a public inquiry into the development proposal.

Mr. Tracey: The Department's evidence to the Select Committee on the Environment's investigation of appeals, call-in and major public inquiries, reported:

"in the year April 1984—March 1985 a little over 12,300 deemed permissions were granted. Of these almost 1,400 in respect of land vested in local authorities but where the development was to be carried out by others. We do not know how many of these permissions represented departures from development plans".

Nor do we know in how many cases a public inquiry was held. The Select Committee recommended in its subsequent report that "the Department conducts a thoroughgoing review of the procedures by which local authorities grant themselves planning permission".

In their response (Cmnd. 43) the Government noted that the Department is reviewing the working of the 1976 General Regulations, which prescribe the relevant procedures.

British Board of Agrement

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the progress, morale and performance of the British Board of Agrement since 6 June 1984.

Mr. John Patten: Agrement certificates are now recognised, under the building control system introduced in November 1985, as documents which demonstrate compliance with the requirements of the building regulations. The number of valid certificates has increased from 534 in May 1984 to 643 in November 1986. Between December 1985 and November 1986, the board issued 207 certificates, of which 73 were replacements for old ones "recast" in a new format.

Progress towards financial self-sufficiency, which it was forecast would be achieved in financial year 1987-88, is proving slower than anticipated, but grant in aid paid to the board as a proportion of turnover is down, from 31 per cent. in 1984-85 to about 20 per cent. (estimated) for 1986-87.

National Building Agency

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will bring up to date the table set out by the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) on 5 June 1984 regarding the financing of the National Building Agency; and whether the accounts for this body have now been finalised, and the organisation finally dissolved.

Mr. John Patten: The following payments have been made by the Department to meet the closure costs and net liabilities of the National Building Agency over the last three years. There are no other amendments to the June 1984 table.

1984-85	100,000 (reduced from the figure shown in the "grant-in-aid" column in the 1984 table)
1985-86	142,257
1986-87	74,500 (latest estimate)

The liquidators have now wound up most of the agency's affairs, but final dissolution cannot take place until all outstanding claims have been settled.

Warrington and Runcorn Development Corporation

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) on what basis the transfer of development corporation houses belonging to Warrington and Runcorn Development Corporation will take place; how the sale price and repair liability will be determined; and what provisions will be made for tenant involvement;

(2) what questions will be asked of the tenants of Warrington and Runcorn New Town Development Corporation in the survey to determine whom they would like to be the new owners of their rented property; if he will be bound by the results of the survey; when the survey will be carried out; and who will undertake it.

Mr. John Patten: These are matters on which decisions still have to be taken.

Local Authority Housing

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many houses owned by local authorities are currently registered as being empty; if he will break them down by local authority; how many have been unoccupied for more than 12 months; what information he has as to the number in need of urgent repair; what plans he has to deal with the problem; how many people are registered as homeless; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: At national level, the information requested by my hon. Friend is as follows. Local authorities reported that, at 1 April 1986, they had 113,300 vacant dwellings; 27,100 of these had been vacant for over one year; 38,600 were being improved or repaired; and 18,800 were awaiting improvement or repair. At 31 March 1986, there were 15,400 households reported by local authorities as in temporary accommodation under the homelessness provisions of the Housing Act 1985; in the preceding year, authorities accepted responsibility for securing accommodation for 97,100 households under those provisions. Figures for individual local authorities are in the Library: numbers of vacant dwellings are in pages 1.6 to18.6 and 1.7 to 18.7 of the "HIP1 (1986) all items print" and the households in temporary accommodation at 31 March 1986 in table 9*(a)* of "Local Housing Statistics No. 78".

In our view, local authorities can reduce the number of their dwellings standing empty if they implement a number of good management practices, in particular faster reletting procedures and better planned repair and maintenance operations. They also have scope for letting or leasing property for short-life use; if it is let to a registered housing association, they may claim housing association grant to make it fit for short-term letting. Estate Action (UHRU) provides advice and resources for authorities on bringing rundown estates up to an acceptable standard, thereby reducing numbers of difficult-to-let and empty properties. And we are currently consulting on a proposed general consent for local authorities to let empty homes awaiting repair or demolition to housing associations on leases of up to five years.

Inspectorate of Pollution

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will specify the staffing levels of the new inspectorate of pollution.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is expected that the staff complement of the inspectorate when formed on 1 April will be about 190. This figure includes posts which may be transferred to departmental policy directorates after review of the organisation in the first year.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to ensure that all recommendations to central Government emanating from the new inspectorate of pollution will be statutorily available to local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The inspectorate will form part of my Department and will tender advice to Ministers under normal Civil Service rules. It will publish an annual report with a full account of its activities and local reports where applicable and will issue technical advisory and guidance documents.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the specific powers of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution.

Mr. Waldegrave: The formation of the inspectorate will not affect the statutory basis of pollution control. The inspectorate's powers at 1 April and the development of its functions are discussed in a consultation paper, copies of which I placed in the Library of the House last week.

Rate Support Grant

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what effect his recent statements on the rate support grant and rate limitation will have upon ratepayers in the London borough of Haringey in the coming financial year.

Dr. Boyson: My right hon. Friend announced on 13 January that after the passing of the Local Government Finance Bill he intends to make the Rate Support Grant (England) Report 1987-88 under which Haringey will receive £69 million block grant—£18 million more than this year—if it spends at its expenditure level of £153 million, determined for it last July, and to determine a rate limit for Haringey of 239·27p, a reduction of 6 per cent. on its 1986-87 rate.

Mr. Leadbitter asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the effects of his statement on the rate support grant of 13 January, Official Report, column 147, on Cleveland county council, relative to the position as previously announced in his proposals of 3 December.

Mr. Chope: The effect of my right hon. Friend's announcement of 13 January on Cleveland county council is that it will receive £99 million block grant — an increase of £8 million from its position under my right hon. Friend's proposals of 3 December—if it spends at the settlement spending assumption.

Central Council for Physical Recreation

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the cost to central Government of funding the Central Council for Physical Recreation in each of the last six years; and if he will express this annual cost as a percentage of the Sports Council grant.

Mr. Tracey: It is for the Sports Council to determine what grant can be given to the Central Council of Physical Recreation. The figures are as follows:

	SC grant £ million	CCPR grant Actual	CCPR grant as percentage of SC grant
1980-81	19·288	153,228	0·8
1981-82	21·032	150,213	0·7
1982-83	23·752	233,032	0·9
1983-84	27·123	187,688	0·7
1984-85	29·349	300,300	1·0
1985-86	30·612	258,209	0·8

Rating (Rural Communities)

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek power to institute a differential rating scheme for small shops and post offices in rural communities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I will answer this question shortly.

Council House Sales

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council houses have been sold to sitting tenants in the county of Avon in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: The numbers of right-to-buy sales, and other sales to sitting tenants by councils in the county of Avon, are given in the following issues of "Local Housing Statistics" which are available in the Library:

Year	Issue No.
1983-84	75
1984-85	79
1985-86	79

Subsequent to the publication of issue No. 79, Bristol has reported 1,313 sales to sitting tenants in 1984/85 and 903 in 1985/86.

Corresponding figures for each local authority in Avon for the period 1 April to 30 September 1986 are:

	Numbers
Bath	62
Bristol	359
Kingswood	49
Northavon	64
Wansdyke	[1]37
Woodspring	97

[1] 1 April to 30 June only.

Housing Defects Act

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to reimburse the Sandwell metropolitan borough council for expenditure incurred under the Housing Defects Act and subsequent amendment.

Mr. Tracey: It is already the Secretary of State's practice, under section 569 of the Housing Act 1985, to make Exchequer contributions to local authorities in respect of allowable expenditure under the Housing Defects Act and subsequent amendment.

National Mobility Scheme

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council tenants successfully found new accommodation under the national mobility scheme during the last 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Tracey: The national mobility steering committee report for 1985-86 shows that 6,840 tenants were successful in finding new accommodation under the national mobility scheme. The organisation estimates that about 5,700 of these were council tenants.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Universities and Polytechnics

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in the Official Report all those universities which provide undergraduate or postgraduate courses in departments of developments studies; what changes have occurred to student numbers in those departments since the beginning of the academic year in 1979 to the present academic year; and what information he has on the changes which have occurred in the percentage of the total cash available to each university going to these departments over the same period.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In 1979 Birmingham, East Anglia and Kent universities ran undergraduate courses intitled development studies and in 1986 East Anglia, Kent and Swansea ran such courses. These were not all run by departments of development studies. They covered a variety of options mainly in the economics, geography, political and sociology fields which were also included as options in courses at other universities. In 1986, 32 universities offered postgraduate taught or research courses in development studies which also covered a wide range of options. Information on the numbers of students studying the different options is not readily available centrally. Information is not available centrally on expenditure by individual departments (the classification of which varies between universities).

Local Education Authorities (Finance)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in the Official Report for each local education authority in England (a) the capital bid submitted for 1987-88, (b) the allocation announced, (c) the allocation as a percentage of the bid in each case and (d) the 1986-87 allocation in each case.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information is as follows:

Schools (Capital Allocations)

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the capital allocation made to each local education authority for expenditure on schools, in cash and constant prices, for each year since 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the bid made by each local education authority for a capital allocation for expenditure on schools for 1987-88.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information is as follows:

	1987-88 LEAs Plans £ (000's)
Barking	634

Grammar Schools

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many grammar schools have closed in each year since 1970.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information is not available centrally in the form requested. The number of grammar schools in England has fallen over the years as shown in the table below:

January each year	Number of grammar schools
1970	975
1971	918
1972	850
1973	783
1974	655
1975	547

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total expenditure on the assisted places scheme in each year since its introduction.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information requested is as follows:

Financial year	Expenditure £ million
1981-82	3·002
1982-83	8·691
1983-84	14·995
1984-85	22·152
1985-86	29·569

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list in the Official Report (a) the number of assisted places pupils and (b) the percentage of all such pupils in respect of the income schedule for the assisted places scheme.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The latest available information relates to the school year 1985-86 and is as follows:

Income bands	Number of assisted pupils	Percentage distribution
Up to £6,376	7,889	39·3
£6,377—£6,750	692	3·4
£6,751—£7,300	943	4·7

£12,281 upwards	1,779	8·9

Secondary Education

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the number of grammar schools in each local education auhority retaining selective secondary education.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The number of grammar schools in the local education authorities in England which in January 1986 had retained selective education are given below.

Student Awards

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the research into student grants and loans being conducted by the Review Committee on Student Awards will be made public, as well as the evidence submitted to the review by outside bodies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: To assist the review in its work, my Department intends to commission an independent survey into students' income and expenditure. I would expect to publish the findings.

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will name the composition of the Review Committee on Student Awards chaired by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science, the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden).

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The review committee on student awards is composed of Ministers and officials from my Department, the Treasury, the Department of Health and Social Security, the Department of Employment, the Scottish Education Department, Welsh Office Education Department and the Department of Education for Northern Ireland.

Teachers (Pay and Conditions)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his recent discussions concerning teachers' pay and conditions.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Since Christmas I have met representatives of the Professional Association of Teachers on 6 January, representatives of the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers on 12 January, and local authority representatives on 15 January. I remain willing to have further discussion with these and other interested groups and will be meeting representatives of the NUT on 21 January.

Natural History and Geological Museums (Attendances)

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will publish in the Official Report the attendance figures for 1986 reported by the Natural History Museum, comprising its outstations and the Geological Museum, together with the percentage increase or decrease on the attendance figures for 1985.

Mr. Walden: The figures are as follows:

	1985	1986	Percentage increase decrease
British Museum (Natural History)	2,641,806	2,678,175	+1·4
Geological Museum	579,465	444,202	−23·3
Tring Zoological Museum	133,080	117,080	−11·9
TOTAL	3,354,351	3,239,685	−3·4

Road Safety Education

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if all schools in England comply with the Vienna conference of Transport Ministers' (1971) recommendation that a minimum number of hours, between 10 and 20, should be allocated for road safety education on the basis of the scale drawn up by the Vienna conference for the different classes and levels.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not available.

Student Support

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to publish proposals arising from the current review of student support; what period of time is likely to be made available for discussion and consultation on such proposals; what is the earliest academic year in which any such proposals are likely to be implemented; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The work of the student support review is expected to be completed this year. The timetable for consultation and implementation will depend on the outcome of the review and the nature of any changes to the student support system that the Government may decide to propose.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a list showing, for each year since 1979 (a) the total amount paid by his Department in respect of mandatory student awards made by local education authorities, (b) the change in percentage terms of the total amount paid in relation to the preceding year, (c) the number of mandatory awards made and (d) the change in percentage terms of the average amount of departmental expenditure on each mandatory award in relation to the preceding year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information is as follows:

Mandatory awards

England and Wales

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85
(a) DES contribution towards expenditure on mandatory awards (£000)	298,988	358,424	399,012	424,787	451,869	432,203
(b) Percentage change compared with each preceding year	—	+19·9	+11·3	+6·5	+6·4	−4·4
(c) Nos. of mandatory award-holders	322,595	334,575	354,483	370,530	384,621	387,361
(d) Average DES contribution (£) percentage change compared with each preceding year	927	1,071	1,126	1,146	1,175	1,116
	—	+15·5	+5·1	+1·8	+2·5	−5·0

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to publish a response to the first report of the Education, Science and Arts Committee on student awards; what steps he has taken to protect the possibility of a substantial increase being made in levels of student awards for 1987-88 within public expenditure limits; when he expects to announce the levels of student awards for 1987-88; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I hope to announce the levels of student awards shortly, and I cannot anticipate that announcement. I would expect the Government's response to the first report from the Education, Science and Arts Committee to be published before the summer recess.

National Curriculum

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy towards the establishment of a national curriculum for schools; if he will consult local education authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: As I told the North of England education conference on 9 January, I favour establishing a national curriculum which works through national criteria for each subject area of the curriculum. These criteria must be capable of change and development; and must be arrived at by a process of national dialogue, in which local education authorities would be among those with a part to play. I also said that I should now like to hear from those concerned, both within the education service and outside it, where they stand on this matter. I am sending to my hon. Friend a copy of the speech I made on 9 January.

Helsinki Agreement

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how the money set aside by him to support the Helsinki agreement has been used; and if he will list the activities related to article V(8) and VI(5) of the Anglo-Soviet cultural agreement which have been supported.

Mr. Eggar: I have been asked to reply.

I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible with the informatiom requested.

PRIME MINISTER

La Belle Disco Bombing (Berlin)

Mr. Dobson asked the Prime Minister when she last asked the Federal German Government if they had any evidence of Syrian involvement in the bombing of the La Belle disco in Berlin.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing further to add to the answers which I gave to the hon. Member on 12 January at column 3.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister what plans exist about who would be responsible for the decision whether to use British nuclear weapons in the event of all members of the Government being killed in hostilities.

The Prime Minister: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to discuss arrangements for nuclear weapons release.

Regional Development Grants

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister if she will publish a table showing forecast spending at 1986 prices, on regional development grants in (a) England, (b) Scotland and (c) Wales in each year from now until 1989-90; and if she will publish the figures for spending on regional development grants, at 1986 prices, for each year from 1979-80 for England, Scotland and Wales.

The Prime Minister: I will reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Kenya (AIDS)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what help Her Majesty's Government have offered the Government of Kenya to combat the spread of AIDS.

Mr. Chris Patten: We are giving substantial support to the World Health Organisation to help combat the spread of AIDS in several countries, including Kenya. We are ready to consider further requests for help in association with the WHO, to complement what we have already given.

TRANSPORT

Passenger Transport Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the 1987-88 expenditure levels for all six passenger transport authorities and the comparable figure for 1986-87.

Mr. David Mitchell: Under the provisions of the Local Government Finance Bill the normal precept limitation processes under the Rates Act 1984 have had to be suspended in respect of 1987-88. Instead, it is intended that maximum precepts should be prescribed by means of a formula which will apply a standard uplift of 2 per cent. to the expenditure levels which were proposed for the six PTAs last July. The following are the relevant figures:

2 per cent. Uplift	Redetermined expenditure level 1986-87		1987-88 Original expenditure level
	£ million	£ million	£ million
Greater Manchester	83·5	74·1	75·582
Merseyside	81·3	67·7	69·054
South Yorkshire	59·3	45·7	46·614
Tyne and Wear	63·9	56·6	57·732
West Midlands	58·1	55·1	56·202
West Yorkshire	61·3	57·9	59·058

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration has been given to the effect of cutbacks in British Rail's Freightliner system upon the traffic likely to be generated by the proposed Channel tunnel, in so far as that affects the viability of the project, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: Decisions on the level of Freightliners services are a matter for commercial judgment by its board. Freightliners is keen to take full advantage of the opportunity offered by the Channel tunnel. Its plans will enable it to offer a comprehensive network of railborne container services through the tunnel and it is confident it will have sufficient capacity to handle the traffic generated by the opening of the tunnel.

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of traffic generated by the proposed Channel tunnel is anticipated to terminate at Waterloo.

Mr. David Mitchell: British Rail estimates that about 70 per cent. of the passengers using its through Channel tunnel rail services will pass through the proposed Waterloo terminal.

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether live animals for sale will be shipped as freight through the proposed Channel tunnel fixed link.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I have been asked to reply.

The importation of live animals through the Channel tunnel is still under consideration but could only take place subject to stringent import controls, including quarantine arrangements being fully met.

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether checks for rabies and other disease will be undertaken by Her Majesty's inspectors (a) before, (b) after or (c) at Ashford in traffic using the proposed Channel tunnel.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I have been asked to reply.

Following preliminary discussions which have taken place with the concessionaires Eurotunnel, the Government will require that stringent import controls designed to protect our animal health status will be fully met and will be carried out either at Frethun in France or at Cheriton in this country.

The present rabies controls will apply to the tunnel. Checks for illegal importations of rabies-susceptible animals will be carried out at Frethun and the authorisation of Frethun (or Cheriton) as an approved port for the reception of licensed imports would depend on statutory requirements being fully met.

Roads

Mr. Fry asked the Secretary of State for Transport which new road schemes will be added to the national road programme following the financing of a number of schemes in south-east England by the European Economic Community in accordance with the recently-announced plans approved by the European Ministers of Transport.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am carrying out a review of the national road programme and aim to publish the results in the spring.

Buses

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of services run prior to 1 April 1986 have been registered for commercial operation under the Transport Act 1985; and what percentage of services run prior to 1 April 1986 are now covered under the tendering arrangements.

Mr. David Mitchell: Detailed figures are not available, but present indications are that 70 to 80 per cent. of bus mileage run prior to 1 April 1986 has been registered for commercial operation under the Transport Act 1985, and that most of the remainder is now run under subsidy contracts.

Bus Lanes

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the future of the bus lanes which run along Millbank to Parliament square; what recent assessment has been made of their impact on traffic flows; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The city of Westminster commissioned a study into the bus lanes in Millbank and Whitehall, which was completed in December 1986. I understand it will be considering the findings of the study shortly. It is for it as the highway authority to consider what future action to take.

Woolwich Free Ferry

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration he has given to reducing the hours of operation of the Woolwich free ferry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The hours of operation are one of the matters being considered in the management review of the ferry.

Signposting

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report for each motorway in England a list of those tourist or historic attractions which are signposted.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Tourist attractions currently signed from motorways in England are listed in the table. These include some signs erected before the introduction of the new white on brown signs in April 1986. Negotiations are in hand with operators for signing a number of other large attractions from motorways. It is expected that many of these will be signed in time for the summer 1987 tourist season.

Motorway	Tourist attractions signed
M1	Sherwood Forest Woburn[1] Whipsnade[1] Alton Towers

M6	Park-Hall Camelot Martin Mere Wildfowl Trust Alton Towers[1]
M25	Wisley Gardens[1]
M56	Chester Zoo[1]

[1] White on blue signs. All other attractions Listed have white on brown signs.

School Transport

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to introduce a maximum age for driving buses and coaches used for school transport.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I see no case for maximum ages for driving, unrelated to individual fitness. School buses are often driven by public service vehicle drivers, who are subject to annual medical examinations from the age of 65. All drivers are legally required to notify DVLC of disabilities when they occur and to provide a health declaration when they renew their ordinary licences, every three years from the age of 70.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to require adult supervision of children on buses and coaches carrying children to and from school.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No; the supervision of schoolchildren on school buses is a matter for the local education authority in conjunction with the operator.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to require school buses and coaches to have a special colour distinguishing them from other public transport vehicles.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. In the United Kingdom, buses are rarely used exclusively for the transport of schoolchildren. It would be impractical to insist on a specialised livery for vehicles used for schools services.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to make it compulsory for drivers of school buses and coaches to activate the four vehicle distress lights when halted for children to alight.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. Hazard warning lights are understood as indicating the presence of a temporary obstruction—often a vehicle that is broken down. They could distract attention from other hazards such as a child crossing the road.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to make it compulsory for school buses and coaches to be fitted with automatic door controls.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. There are already requirements for the safe control of power-operated doors. They apply to all public service vehicles.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has plans to increase the frequency of inspection of school buses and coaches as vehicles get older.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: School buses and coaches are subject to an annual test. I have no plans to inrease the frequency of inspections.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it mandatory for school buses to carry rear signplates conforming to sign A12 in the Vienna convention (1968), that is, a rectangular panel with black silhouettes of children on a yellow ground.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have no plans to make such a sign mandatory on buses owned by schools or otherwise used for school children. Bus and coach operators may use any type of "school bus" sign when carrying out schools services. School authorities are free to specify the use of such a sign if they so wish before letting a contract.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to make it mandatory for school buses and coaches to be fitted with safety belts on front-row seats.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We recently circulated for comment a proposal to mandate the fitting of seat belts to the front seats of all new large coaches and minibuses. This proposal was widely supported. It will be included in regulations to be made within the next few months.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce a maximum vehicle age for school buses and coaches.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. There is no maximum age prescribed for any type of vehicle but they have to pass an annual test. If a vehicle is found to be unfit, it is prohibited until the defects are cleared.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information does his Department hold on the adequacy of child passenger supervison on school buses.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This is a matter for the local education authority in conjunction with the operator.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information his Department has about maximum limits relating to age or mileage that other countries place on buses taking children to and from school; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have no information on this. The EEC roadworthiness directive requires passenger vehicles with more than eight passenger seats to pass an annual test.

Public Transport (Speed Governors)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to introduce compulsory speed governors on all new public transport vehicles over 10 tonnes.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We will be consulting interested parties within the next few months on draft regulations which will require speed limiters to be fitted in due course to all coaches which are capable of exceeding the motorway speed limit.

Safety Helmets

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to make it mandatory for all motor cycle safety helmets to bear fluorescent and reflective markings.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. Placing adhesive stickers on, or painting, helmets can harm their protective quality. We advise motor cyclists to wear conspicuous clothing.

Motor Cycles

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report in rank order (a) the motor cycle casualties per million of the population and (b) the number of motor cycle casualties per 1000 vehicles for Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Finland, Germany, Italy, Netherlands, Norway, Switzerland and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I will answer this question shortly.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to ban the importation of motor cycles with a power exceeding 75 kW.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to require riders of motor cycles having a cylinder capacity of more than 350 cc to submit themselves to a special medical examination every two years for the renewal of their licences.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. There is no evidence to suggest that medical condition constitutes a significant factor in motor cycle accidents, any more than it does in accidents generally. Such a requirement offers no obvious road safety benefits.

Drivers (Speed Limits)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to introduce speed limits for beginner drivers who have passed their driving test.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. The evidence from those countries where such restrictions are in force does not suggest that they produce a clear road safety benefit.

Child Safety

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information is available to his Department about the relative risk of death or serious injury to children in car crashes when the child is not wearing a suitable restraint and is seated (a) in the front of the car and (b) in the back.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Various studies have shown that an unrestrained child is safer in the rear than in the front of a car. Relative accident rates are not available from United Kingdom national statistics. An unrestrained child is much more likely to be injured or killed in an accident than a restrained child.

Information on child restraints is available through the Department's freephone road safety information service 0800 234 888. I strongly advice parents to fit and use child restraints.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps his Department takes to prevent the use of ineffective or unsafe safety devices for children in cars.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Our regulations require child restraints used in cars to be approved to the appropriate British standards or United Nations Economic Commission for Europe regulations. These standards are kept under review and amended as necessary to increase the safety of child restraints.

Car Telephones

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what representations he has received regarding the use of hand-held car telephones whilst driving;

(2) what plans he has to introduce a safety code for the use of car telephones; and if he will incorporate such a code in any revised edition of the highway code;

(3) whether he has received a copy of the mobile communications police and motoring organisations safety code of practice for the use of car phones; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The revised highway code to be published shortly contains new advice on the use of microphones and car telephones. This advice is:

"Do not use a hand-held microphone or telephone handset while your vehicle is moving, except in an emergency. You should only speak into a fixed, neckslung, or clipped on microphone when it would not distract your attention from the road. Do not stop on the hard shoulder of a motorway to answer or make a call, however urgent."

As part of the consultation on the proposed amendments to the highway code, some 30 organisations commented on the subject of car telephones. All the comments were taken into account in preparing the new advice.

British Telecom Mobile Communications is currently considering with various interested parties a safety code for the use of its car telephones which amplifies the new highway code advice.

Taxi Drivers (U Turns)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what regulations govern the making by London taxi drivers of U-turns on main roads.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Unless prohibited by a traffic regulation order, this manoeuvre may be carried out anywhere provided that it is safe to do so. London-type taxis are specially constructed so as to be able to execute this kind of turn.

London Regional Transport (Vehicle Imports)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what directives or requests he has made to the London London Regional Transport in respect of import of vehicles for its services and those of its contractors.

Mr. David Mitchell: Like other nationalised industries, London Regional Transport is expected to follow the Government's purchasing policy, which encourages them to buy British goods provided that the products and prices are right. It is up to the management of LRT to apply these principles to individual purchasing decisions but I am pleased to say that the vast majority of LRT's vehicles are British-made.

Traffic Lights, Greater London

Mr. Ground asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what steps the London residuary body is taking to restore to working order the traffic lights at the crossroads formed by Wellington road south and Hanworth road, Hounslow, which have been out of action for more than two days; what reason has been given for the delay in repairing the lights and for the absence of manual controls in the meantime; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what procedures have been laid down for providing manual control of traffic when traffic lights at busy crossroads in Greater London are out of action.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The present procedures aim to get malfunctioning traffic lights back into commission as quickly as possible. I understand that the contractors took the required steps the same day to restore the lights at this crossroads. A major unit had to be replaced and the effect on the equipment of the snow and freezing conditions meant it did not operate satisfactorily until 14 January. Manual control in the event of traffic lights failure is used only at the busiest junctions at peak times given manpower considerations. As is usual, warning signs were placed on the approaches to this particular crossroads to advise that the signals were out of action.

M20 (Ashford-Hollingbourne)

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total amount of money that has now been spent on design work, administration and construction of the Ashford-Hollingbourne section of the M20.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The costs to date are as follows:

Design work	2,887,000
Surveys and Testing	417,000
Advance construction of two bridges	2,296,000
Other expenses	17,000
	£5,617,000

Staff and other costs in the period up to 1980 when detailed design was undertaken by the Department's Kent sub-unit are not available.

It is not practicable to estimate the Department's administrative costs.

Motorway Fog Detectors

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will install on the M1 at its junction with the M6 Marconi MET-3 fog detectors for a period of evaluation.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There are no present plans to install fog detection equipment on the M1 motorway. As announced on 29 October, trials of differing designs of equipment will be carried out elsewhere over this winter and next winter to decide which design best meets the Department's requirements. The new system will then be installed at the 30 fog-prone sites on the M25 identified by the Metrological Office. The work is due for completion in 1990. The effectiveness of the system will be monitored to determine whether it should be used on other motorways.

British Rail (Services)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has received from British Rail about its level of services during the current exceptional weather, and as to its plans for coping with similar conditions in the future; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: British Rail has supplied me with frequent information about the effect of this week's abnormally severe weather on its services. I shall, of course, want to consider with the board whether there are any particular lessons to be learnt for the future, but these extremely low temperatures occur very rarely and the board should incur expenditure only if it can be shown to be cost-effective.

Road Accidents (Statistics)

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many motorists were (a) killed and (b) injured in driving accidents in (i) England and (ii) the county of Avon in each of the following years 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985 and 1986, respectively.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I will answer this question shortly.

Bus Deregulation

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the progress to date on bus deregulation in Avon.

Mr. David Mitchell: Bus service levels have been broadly maintained in Avon, and the county council has made a saving of some £1 million in its annual subsidy bill. The inevitable initial teething troubles are now being resolved, and there are substantial numbers of minibuses operating in Bristol, Bath and Weston-Super-Mare. The Government were able to approve the sale of Badgerline, formerly a subsidiary of the National Bus Company, to its own management last September.

Freight (Statistics)

Mr. Leadbitter asked the Secretary of State for Transport what were the returns in volume and value of freight carried for each of the years 1981 to 1985 and the numbers employed in the Freightliner service for those years; and if he will estimate future trends.

Mr. David Mitchell: The information for the years 1981 to 1985 is as follows:

	1981	1982	1983	1984-85	1985-86
Volume of freight carried 1 000's	824	766	975	852	886
Revenue (£ million)	72·1	69·6	97·6	101·7	107·0
Staff employed at year's end	2,215	2,087	2,028	1,907	1,844

[1] Containers forwarded by land in 20 foot equivalent units (TEU's).

Future trends in the business are a matter of commercial judgment for the Freightliners board.

Roads (Maintenance)

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied with the arrangements for technical supervision on continuous and periodic bases of a highway maintenance arrangement under section 42 of the Highways Act 1980 when a non-metropolitan district council exercises its option to undertake the maintenance of its unclassified roads; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Yes. Day-to-day supervision of works is the responsibility of the district council. The county council is responsible for approving the district council's detailed estimates, and may withhold payment until it is satisfied that the works are properly executed.

The Audit Commission is currently undertaking a special study into highway maintenance which includes agency arrangements between county and district councils.

Transport Supplementary Grant

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list in the Official Report for each authority in England (i) their bid for capital allocation and transport supplementary grant for 1987-88, (ii) the allocation announced in each case and (iii) the allocation as a percentage of the bid in each case.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information for the 108 local highway authorities eligible to receive transport supplementary grant in 1987-88 is as follows:

SCOTLAND

Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Areas Act 1979

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make available maps, showing the full extent of sites scheduled under the Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Areas Act 1979, to local authorities involved in any planning or building applications on areas identified as scheduled sites.

Mr. Ancram: Local authorities already have access to this information. For monuments scheduled before 1983, a complete list of monuments is given in the booklet "List of Ancient Monuments in Scotland", published by HMSO in 1983, which includes map references. For subsequent scheduling, the local authority in whose area a site is situated is provided with full details, including maps.

Any authority in doubt about the status of a given site can, of course, also consult my Department's Historic Buildings and Monuments Directorate.

Archaeological Sites

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will issue guidance to local authorities advising them of the importance of updating the lists of all archaeological sites in their area.

Mr. Ancram: Responsibility for surveying and recording archaeological sites lies with the Royal Commission on the Ancient and Historical Monuments of Scotland. Lists issued by or through the Commission are made available to local authorities, but it is for the local authorities to decide whether they should themselves maintain records of sites in their areas.

"Children's Play in Scotland"

Mr. McCartney asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will respond to recommendation 4 of the policy statement, "Children's Play in Scotland", published by the Scottish Community Education Council in spring 1985.

Mr. John MacKay: I hope to be in a position to do so soon.

Museums and Galleries

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will publish in the Official Report the attendance figures for 1986 reported by the national museums and galleries in Scotland, broken down to the individual institutions but comprising their outstations, with figures in each case of the percentage increase or decrease on the attendance figures for 1985.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

	1986	Percentage change since 1985
National Galleries of Scotland	529,675	−1·5
National Museums of Scotland	466,816	−34·2

The National Galleries of Scotland comprise the National Gallery of Scotland, the Scottish National Gallery of Modern Art and the Scottish National Portrait Gallery. The National Museums of Scotland comprise the Royal Museum of Scotland buildings at Chambers street and Queen street, Edinburgh, the Scottish Agricultural Museum, the Scottish United Services Museum, the Museum of Flight and the Shambellie Museum of Costume.

The Chambers street building of the Royal Museum of Scotland was closed from July to early October 1986 to allow roof repairs to be undertaken. Refurbishment was also undertaken at the National Portrait Gallery during 1986, causing a drop in attendances. Attendances at the National Gallery of Scotland and the Gallery of Modern Art were higher than in 1985.

Signposting

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report, for each motorway in Scotland, a list of those tourist or historic attractions which are signposted.

Mr. Ancram: Scone Palace in Tayside region is signposted from the M85 and M90, and Bannockburn heritage centre in Central region is signposted from the M80 and M9.

Mental Illness

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the number of beds for the treatment of mental illness in Scotland in (a) 1972, (b) 1982 and (c) the latest available year for (i) general hospitals (ii) mental hospitals and (iii) other residential facilities.

Mr. John MacKay: The average number of available staffed beds classified for mental illness and geriatric, child and adolescent psychiatry in general hospitals, in mental hospitals and in all other NHS hospitals in Scotland in 1971, 1982 and 1986 is as follows. Figures for 1972 are not readily available.

	Six months to 31 March 1971	Year Ending 30 September 1982	Year Ending 31 March 1986
General Hospitals	468	441	781
Mental Hospitals	19,096	15,945	14,935
Other Hospitals	117	257	486
Total	19,681	16,643	16,202

In addition, in 1986, 68 registered nursing homes admitted some mentally ill patients but had no beds specifically classified for that purpose.

Health Services

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give (a) the total gross expenditure on the National Health Service, (b) capital expenditure on hospitals and community health services for each year since 1974-75 in cash terms and adjusted by (i) the gross domestic product deflator, (ii) the National Health Service pay and prices index and (iii) taking account of demographic factors, with special regard to the needs of the elderly.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

Total gross NHS expenditure

	£ million cash	Adjusted by the GDP deflator	Adjusted by the NHS pay and price index
1974-75	453	1,532	1,666
1975-76	596	1,604	1,708

1983-84	99	109	108
1984-85	106	112	112
1985-86	120	120	120

Note: Separate NHS pay and price factors are not available for Scotland. The factors used are those maintained by DHSS for England.

Information is not available about the cost to the NHS programme as a whole of meeting demand from demographic change. Average growth of demand on hospital and community health services caused by demographic factors over the period since 1974-75 is assessed at about 0·5 per cent. per annum.

Pharmaceuticals

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will update the information on prescription charges and the cost of pharmaceuticals given on 12 November 1985, Official Report, columns 743-4, by giving figures for subsequent years up to the most recent available date.

Mr. John MacKay: The information available on NHS prescriptions dispensed by chemist contractors and appliance suppliers in Scotland in the period July 1985—September 1986 is given in the table:

	1985			1986
	July—September	October—December	January—March	April—June	July—September

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) whether ambulance staff have participated in the exercise of the local emergency plan at each of Dounreay, Torness and Hunterston; and, in each case where units were involved, if he will list which ones participated;

(2) what training has been given to ambulance staff to deal with a major accident at Dounreay, Hunterston, and Torness, respectively;

(3) if he will list for Dounreay, Hunterston and Torness what studies have been done on the problems of evacuating all low mobility groups in the event of a worst case atomic accident; and if he will also list for each study the geographical area covered;

(4) if he will list what specialist equipment, including personal dosimeters, radiac survey meters and decontamination meters are available for ambulance staff at Dounreay, Torness and Hunterston, respectively; and in each case what training staff have received.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Granton Gasworks, Edinburgh

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received on the proposed closure of Granton gasworks, Edinburgh; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend has received no such representations. The commercial operation of Granton gasworks is a matter for British Gas plc. I understand that a decision has been taken to close the plant with effect from February 1987. Discussions are currently being held with the 80 employees likely to be affected. I understand that British Gas plc has undertaken to redeploy those who wish to remain in employment.

Student Grants

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report figures showing the maintenance element of student grants in 1985-86.

Mr. John MacKay: In the students' allowances scheme, which is administered by the Scottish Education Department and is broadly comparable with the scheme of mandatory support for English — Welsh students, maintenance allowances (including reimbursement of travelling expenses) totalling £66·66 million have been paid to Scottish students for the academic session 1985-86.

Students' maintenance allowances in that year were:

Students living in the parental home	1,365
Elsewhere (other than in London)	1,775
Elsewhere (in London)	2,110

Subject to reductions according to the income of parents, spouses or the students themselves. Travelling expenses in excess of £50, if necessarily incurred in connection with study, were also reimbursed.

Dundee

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the number and percentage of people employed in manufacturing services, construction and primary industries in each district ward in Dundee at the 1981 census; and what subsequent comparative information on such district wards he possesses.

Mr. Lang: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

United States (Trade Policies)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next expects to meet his American counterparts to discuss the United States administration's policies on trade.

Mr. Alan Clark: My right hon. Friend plans to visit the United States and meet his counterparts within the next few months.

Film Releasing Experiment

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has yet completed his review of the Manchester and Glasgow film releasing experiment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: No. I have not yet received the Director General of Fair Trading's assessment of the Manchester and Glasgow film releasing experiment.

Copying and Counterfeiting

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many cases have been taken up with national authorities of copying and couterfeiting of British goods sold in overseas markets.

Mr. Pattie: The Government have made and continue to make representations to the authorities in countries where counterfeiting and other infringements of intellectual property rights are a general problem. However, action in individual cases is normally the responsibility of the owners of the rights being infringed to pursue. My Department aims to be kept informed about progress in such cases, and is currently in contact with several firms whose products are being counterfeited abroad, with their representative bodies, and with relevant diplomatic posts. Our posts are under instructions to give assistance, and to report cases of piracy and counterfeiting of British goods which come to their attention. Representations may be made as appropriate, and this has been done twice in the last six months.

Departmental Expenditure (Wales)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the total expenditure of his Department which is incurred in Wales for the current financial year and the most recent for which complete information is available.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I will reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Trade Statistics

Dr. Hampson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the latest figures on the balance of trade between the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

Mr. Alan Clark: On an overseas trade statistics basis, the balance of trade between the United Kingdom and the United States of America for the period January to November 1986 is in surplus by £1,779 million.

United States (Trade Tariff)

Dr. Hampson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) when he intends to meet the United States special trade representative; and what position he will take on the 200 per cent. tariff increase on gin proposed by the United States Government;

(2) what estimate he has made of the impact on profitability and jobs in the gin industry of the proposed 200 per cent. increase on gin imports into the United States of America.

Mr. Alan Clark: Negotiations continue in an attempt to settle the Community's outstanding dispute with the United States over the trade consequences of Spanish and Portuguese accession. The Community has made it clear that it will respond in kind to disproportionate retaliation of the sort announced by the United States on 30 December against a range of exports, including gin. We estimate that a 200 per cent. tariff would have the effect of effectively eliminating sales of British-bottled gin from the United States market (current sales: £52 million). The impact on profitability and employment in the United Kingdom must depend on the length of time that such a measure would be in force. We hope that implementation can be avoided, and continue in our efforts to promote a mutually satisfactory negotiated solution.

Pilkington plc

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects the Office of Fair Trading to complete its consideration of the BTR bid for Pilkington.

Mr. Howard [pursuant to his reply, 15 January 1987]: It was announced on 15 January that my right hon. Friend had decided not to refer this proposed takeover to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. His decision was in accordance with the recommendation of the Director General of Fair Trading.

Assisted Areas

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his time schedule for reviewing the assisted areas of England and Wales; and if he will publish his decisions.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 16 January 1987]: The review of the administrative arrangements and effectiveness of the regional policy established in 1984 has been completed. I hope to announce decisions shortly.

Regional Aid

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a table showing at 1986 prices the value of regional aid grants paid to each region, Scotland and Wales from 1978-79 onwards.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 16 January]: The question has been interpreted to refer to regional development grants. The information requested is as follows.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Bail Applications

Mr. Bell asked the Attorney-General what was the number of bail applications which were refused for those charged with scheduled offences during the years 1983, 1984 and 1985; how many bail applications for scheduled offences have been granted for the same years; and how many of those granted bail did not comply with its conditions during the same years.

The Attorney-General: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Legal Aid

Mr. Silvester asked the Attorney-General how many certificates he has issued in respect of United Kingdom citizens under rule 3 of the legal aid addendum to the rules of procedure of the European Commission of Human Rights.

Mr. Lyell: I have been asked to reply.

Statistics for cases involving the European Commission of Human Rights are not maintained separately. During the 12 months ending 13 January 1987, a total of 134 certificates were issued in respect of United Kingdom citizens involved in civil proceedings outside the United Kingdom and this figure would include any cases involving the European Commission. It is estimated that any European Commission cases will be in single figures.

ENERGY

British Coal

Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on British Coal's external financing limit for 1986-87.

Mr. David Hunt: British Coal's EFL for 1986-87 is to be increased by £95 million to £825 million. Despite vigorous action to save costs, it has not been possible to contain the impact of the weakening in the energy market and of the generally mild weather of recent months. The increase is being charged to the reserve and is within the estimate for the planning total in the public expenditure White Paper. It remains British Coal's objective to break-even by 1988-89.

Gas and Electricity (Charges)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the cost of abolishing standing charges for gas and electricity for (a) all households and (b) pensioner households only, giving for each (i) an estimate of the gross annual cost, and (ii) an estimate of the cost net of any savings in social security payments.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Abolition of standing charges for all gas and electricity consumers would cost each of the industries concerned some £550 million a year in lost revenue. Abolition for pensioner households alone would cost both industries about £300 million a year in total.

The revenue so lost would have to be recovered through increased unit prices. Any effect on social security payments would be negligible. Moreover, the increased unit prices would penalise those with large heating needs, many of whom are elderly and among the least well-off.

Mr. Leadbitter asked the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has had with the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board and British Gas to consider schemes of assistance to old people who are at risk during periods of excessively cold weather.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My Department has been kept in touch with the schemes of assistance and other measures which the electricity and gas industries take to assist the elderly and others in need. These include easy payment schemes, the code of practice safeguards on disconnection, advice on insulation, and other measures in order to help ensure warmth in cold weather.

Nuclear Safety

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether ambulance staff have participated in the exercise of the local emergency plan at Chapel Cross, Sellafield, Wylfa, Trawsfyndd, Oldbury, Berkeley, Hinkley Point, Winfrith, Dungerness, Bradwell and Sizewell; and, in each case where units were involved, if he will list which ones participated.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will list for each of the following power stations what studies have been made of the problems of evacuating all low mobility groups in the event of a worst case atomic accident at each of Chapel Cross, Sellafield, Wylfa, Trawsfyndd, Oldbury, Berkeley, Hinkley Point, Winfrith, Dungeness, Bradwell, Sizewell and Hartlepool; and if he will also list for each study the geographical area covered;

(2) what specialist equipment, including personal dosimeters, radiac survey meters and decontamination meters are available for ambulance staff at Chapel Cross, Sellafield, Wylfa, Trawsfyndd, Oldbury, Berkeley, Hinkley Point, Winfrith, Dungeness, Bradwell and Sizewell, respectively; and in each case what training staff have received;

(3) what training has been given to ambulance staff to deal with a major accident at each of the following nuclear installations: Chapel Cross, Sellafield, Wylfa, Trawsfyndd, Oldbury, Berkeley, Hinkley Point, Winfrith, Dungeness, Bradwell, Sizewell and Hartlepool.

Mr. Goodlad: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Nuclear Installations Inspectorate

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) further to his reply to the hon. Member for Yeovil on 19 December, Official Report, column 764, how many nuclear installation inspectorate inspectors have been engaged full time on each review at all times since March 1983; what other duties have been undertaken by inspectors working on these reviews; and if he will make a statement;

(2) further to his reply to the hon. Member for Yeovil on 19 December, Official Report, column 764, when he expects the reviews of Calder Hall and Chapel Cross to be concluded; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Gas and Electricity (Disconnection)

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will introduce legislation to oblige gas and electricity suppliers to desist from disconnecting households with elderly people or young children during winter months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The Gas and Electricity industries operate a code of practice on disconnection, which is monitored by their consumers' councils. The code is designed to safeguard households which contain young children or pensioners, and provides that no pensioner household will be disconnected between 1 October and 31 March. I believe these measures operate satisfactorily.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will introduce legislation to require gas and electricity suppliers not to disconnect supplies to domestic households unless the occupier has been given prior written notice giving reasonable notice of disconnection; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him today. The industries' procedures provide for adequate written notice where disconnection is being considered.

Power Stations

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Energy on what date consent was given for Heysham II; whether alternative siting costs had been considered before consent was given; whether the Central Electricity Generating Board had made available to his Department (a) statements of capital costs for alternative sites, (b) calculations of net effective costs for alternative sites, (c) a detailed comparison of system or benefits and operational factors for alternative sites or (d) a detailed statement of projected future development of the electricity system in the medium term; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to his questions on 12 December 1986 at columns 244-5. The date of the original consent referring to the Heysham site under section 2 of the Electric Lighting Act 1909, as subsequently amended, was 29 October 1969.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish a list showing, for each existing consent under section 2 of the Electric Lighting Act 1909, as subsequently amended, where construction has not yet started (a) the name of the site, (b) the type and capacity of station for which consent exists, (c) when consent was given, (d) whether planning permission has also been granted, or has been deemed to have been granted, (e) the earliest date on which either consent or planning permission expires, (f) whether alternative siting costs were considered before consent was given and (g) whether a public inquiry was held before consent was given; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I will write to the hon. Member with the information requested as soon as possible.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many nuclear reactors were not providing power to the grid on 15 January, and why.

Mr. Goodlad: This is a matter for the CEGB, and I have asked the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many nuclear power stations in the United Kingdom are currently not contributing electricity to the grid; and for what reasons.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given today to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell).

Energy Committee (Departmental Memorandum)

Sir Ian Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish in the Official Report an updated version of the information provided in his Department's memorandum to the Energy Committee, published in HC (1985-86) 196-i, so far as the statistics contained in paragraphs 10.1 and 10.2 and relating to the coal firing scheme are concerned.

Mr. David Hunt: The Department of Energy's memorandum to the Energy Committee relating to the coal firing scheme can be updated as follows.

"The Coal Firing Scheme

10.1 The Secretary of State for Energy announced on the 22 November 1985 that the Government's Coal Firing Scheme will remain open for applications until 30 June 1987. The ceiling of £75 million on the amount of grant that could be paid was lifted. The scheme gives practical expression to the Government's commitment to the coal industry by providing grant aid in respect of the higher capital cost associated with conversion to coal firing. Companies eligible for Coal Firing Grant may also apply for a loan from the European Coal and Steel Community whose terms are well suited to projects with high initial capital costs.

10.2 At the end of December 1986 there were over 475 active coal firing projects including nearly 420 where the project is already underway and 13 where grant has been offered but not yet accepted. Total annual coalburn for all projects which have been offered grant is £2·7 million tonnes; £50 million has been offered grants and a further £1-4 million grant could result from projects still under consideration."

EMPLOYMENT

New Workers Scheme

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Paymaster General how many applications have been received from employers within the Hereford and Leominster travel-to-work area and the Ross and Andaford travel-to-work area in respect of the new workers scheme; and how many people have been employed on this basis in those areas.

Mr. Lee: Statistics are not available under the new workers scheme for travel-to-work areas. However, in the Shropshire, Hereford and Worcester area (which includes Hereford, Leominster and Ross-on-Wye) 1,037 new workers scheme applications have been received and 954 young people are currently in jobs supported under the Scheme. In addition, in the Gloucestershire and Wiltshire area, which includes Cinderford, 690 applications have been received and 661 young people are currently in jobs supported under the scheme.

Training Costs

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Paymaster General if he will estimate by how much the income maintenance costs of the employment and training measures listed in the letter from the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Lang) to the hon. Member for Kensington, dated 5 June 1986, would be reduced in 1986-87, assuming deductions in the allowances payable of (a) £10 per single person aged 16 years and over and £10 per dependent spouse and (b) £23 per single person aged 16 years and over and £23 per dependent spouse but with no changes to payments under the community programme or the job release scheme.

Mr. Lee: It is not possible to estimate the effect of these assumed deductions in allowances for 1986-87. The total cost of allowances paid during this period will not be known until after the end of the financial year. Using the 1985-86 figures quoted in the letter of 5 June 1986 from the then Under-Secretary of State the deductions in the allowances payable referred to would reduce income maintenance costs for each of the relevant schemes by:

Assumed deductions in allowances per single person aged 16 years and over and dependent spouse

£ million

	(a) £10	(b) £23
Adult training	9·00	21·0
YTS[1]	178·00	409·0
Community[1] industry	3·50	8·1
Enterprise[1] allowance scheme	25·85	59·4
Employment rehabilitation	1·60	3·6

[1] There is no additional allowance for dependent spouse.

The reductions in income maintenance costs used in the reply have been calculated on the assumption that the assumed deductions from the allowances would have left all other aspects of the scheme, including take up, average survival etc., unchanged.

Employment Census

Mr. Leighton asked the Paymaster General when the results of the 1987 employment census will be published.

Mr. Lee: The planning of the 1987 census is in its early stages and a detailed timetable has yet to be prepared. The information requested is therefore not yet available. However, I understand that the aim is to produce results some 18 months after the census reference date.

Sunderland Job Club

Mr. Clay asked the Paymaster General how many of the first 100 persons to find work as a result of being a member of Sunderland job club are currently in employment.

Mr. Lee: The Manpower Services Commission does not maintain contact with job club members after they leave the job club. Consequently, we cannot say how many of the first 100 job club members to find work are currently working.

Mr. Clay asked the Paymaster General how many of the first 100 persons to find work as a result of being a member of Sunderland job club are employed through the community programme.

Mr. Lee: The Manpower Services Commission has informed me that, of the first 100 people finding work, 33 joined the community programme.

Mr. Clay asked the Paymaster General how many people were members of Sunderland job club on 17 November 1986.

Mr. Lee: This information is not available in the precise form requested. However on 5 December 1986, the date on which statistics were collected, Sunderland job club had 26 members.

Employment Statistics

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Paymaster General if he will now take steps to collect information on the numbers of employees in (a) full-time and (b) part-time employment in those companies which have accepted trainees under the new training initiative pilot scheme in Dundee (i) prior to the trainees joining the companies, and (ii) one month after the trainees joined the companies.

Mr. Lee: Such information could be collected on a regular basis only at disproportionate cost. However, evaluation undertaken by independent consultants by sample survey will cover the effects of the job training scheme pilots.

Action for Jobs Programme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General (1) how many opinion formers and business leaders have been invited to the breakfast launches of the action for jobs programme (a) nationally and (b) by region;

(2) what was the total cost per head for breakfasts provided for business bodies and opinion formers at the action for jobs launches;

(3) out of whose budget the cost of the breakfast launches for action for jobs for opinion formers and business bodies comes;

(4) what has been the breakdown of costs for the breakfast launch of action for jobs on a region by region basis;

(5) what has been the total cost to the Government of the breakfast presentations to business leaders and opinion formers in relation to the action for jobs project;

(6) which cities and towns have been used for the launch of breakfast presentations by the action for jobs project.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Lord asked the Paymaster General if his Department has considered an application for an exhibition relating to action for jobs to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Service Committee, arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from Monday 2 February to Friday 6 February 1987.

Job Training Scheme

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Paymaster General if he will name the managing agents in each of the pilot areas for the new job training scheme.

Mr. Lee: The managing agents in each of the ten areas piloting the new job training scheme are as follows:
Dundee—Dundee Training for Employment and Enterprise Project (DTEEP) and Skills Training Agency.
Billingham—Cleveland County Council.
Preston — Kedder Training Agency Ltd. and Business Support Unit Limited.
Huddersfield — Kirklees and Wakefield Chamber of Commerce.
Stoke—Quantum Business Service and Longacre Personnel Consultants Ltd.
Port Talbot—A consortium of the Skills Training Agency Afan College and Neath College.
Plymouth—The Chamber of Commerce and Training and Skills Training Agency.
Crawley—North Sussex Youth Training Association and Skills Training Association.
Ealing—London Chamber of Commerce and Industry.
Leicester—Skills Training Agency.

Sex Discrimination Act

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Paymaster General how many actions have been brought against employers under the Sex Discrimination Act in each of the following years (i) 1982, (ii) 1983, (iii) 1984, (iv) 1985 and (v) 1986.

Mr. Lee: The numbers of applications to industrial tribunals under the Sex Discrimination Act were:

	Number
1982	442
1983	350
1984	376
1985	449
[1]1986	548

[1] To end of November only.

A small proportion of these applications relate to the treatment of partners not employees. It is not possible to identify these separately.

Restart Programme

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Paymaster General how many people in Avon have left the employment register through the restart programme since it started.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Paymaster General how many people entered the youth training scheme in Hyndburn and North East Lancashire in 1985; what was the placement percentage; and how many people completed the scheme.

Mr. Trippier: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Intervention Stores

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what are the operational costs of keeping grain stored in intervention in Humberside per year; and what is the market value of the grain stored;

(2) what are the operational costs of keeping butter stored in intervention in Norfolk per year; and what is the market value of the butter stored;

(3) what are the operational costs of keeping butter stored in intervention in Lincolnshire per year; and what is the market value of the butter stored;

(4) what are the operational costs of keeping butter stored in intervention in north Yorkshire per year; and what is the market value of the butter stored;

(5) what are the operational costs of keeping butter stored in intervention in Humberside per year; and what is the market value of the butter stored;

(6) what are the operational costs of keeping grain stored in intervention in Norfolk per year; and what is the market value of the grain stored;

(7) what are the operational costs of keeping grain stored in intervention in Lincolnshire per year; and what is the market value of the grain stored;

(8) what are the operational costs of keeping grain stored in intervention in north Yorkshire per year; and what is the market value of the grain stored.

Mr. Gummer: Storage costs are not recorded separately for different areas. The average annual costs of storage and handling are about £12·50/tonne for cereals and £81·50/tonne for butter. The current average market prices are £110 per tonne for feedwheat and barley and £1,835 per tonne for butter.

EC (Surplus Food and Wine)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps are being taken to intensify the sale of existing surplus food and wine in the European Economic Community following the Council agreement of 16 December; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The Council noted with approval the Commission's intention to undertake an accelerated programme of stock disposals in the milk sector.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) whether, within the environmentally sensitive areas, the payments announced on 18 December 1986 will be available to voluntary conservation bodies for the management of land purchased with the help of grant aid from statutory conservation bodies;

(2) if, within environmentally sensitive areas, the payments announced on 18 December 1986 will be available to all landowners managing land for agricultural purposes, including voluntary conservation bodies.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Dr. David Clark Asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the Nature Conservancy Council is able to offer management agreement to voluntary conservation bodies for land within environmentally sensitive areas purchased with the help of grant aid where it is designated as a site of special scientific interest.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have been asked to reply.

Yes, but the conditions on which such grant is made normally require the future management of the sites to be in the conservation interest. The question of management agreements does not therefore normally arise.

ALURE

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will place the report of the alternative land use in the rural environment working party in the Library.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, Friday 16 January 1987]: No. The Government are considering land use in the context of the reform of the common agricultural policy, and I intend to keep the House informed about my policies in this area.

Mackerel (Scottish Fishing Fleet)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what assessment he has made of the effect on the Scottish fishing fleet of the delay in approving entry into Falmouth bay for the Russian klondykers to transship the mackerel catch; and if he will make a statement;

(2) why the members of the Scottish fishing fleet who normally operate in the south-west mackerel box are being denied the right to commence catching; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1987]: I understand that four Scottish vessels are currently operating in the Channel and they, like the rest of the Scottish pelagic fleet, are free to fish within the south-west mackerel box provided that they comply with the relevant Community technical conservation regulations, which prohibit fishing for mackerel in the box. I also understand that catches of mackerel outside the box have so far been fairly light and that there has been no difficulty in marketing catches.

I have consulted my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on the use of Falmouth as a transshipment port for eastern bloc vessels and he has now concluded that there are no overriding objections to a limited transshipping operation at Falmouth on this occasion. We are now considering what detailed arrangements to make in consultation with the fishing industry.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

United States of America

28. Mr. Forth asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he last paid an official visit to the United States of America.

Mr. Tebbit: On 8 and 9 December 1986.

THE ARTS

Objects in Lieu of Tax

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts whether he will specify the allocations made to public institutions in the United Kingdom during the half year ended 31 December 1986 of individual works of art and museum objects pre-eminent for national, scientific, historic or artistic interest which have been accepted in satisfaction of capital transfer tax or inheritance tax, together with information, where applicable, as to conditions or wishes expressed in the matter of allocation by testators or executors; whether he will list the works of art and museum objects which are still awaiting allocation, with the respective dates of their acceptance in satisfaction of capital transfer tax or inheritance tax; and whether a press notice will be issued from the Office of Arts and Libraries covering the information given in his reply.

Mr. Luce: The information is as follows:

Item	Conditions	Allocation
Items allocated since 1 July 1986
Nine paintings by Ben Nicholson	Wish expressed that two paintings should go to the Tate Gallery and one each should go to the Fitzwilliam and Ashmolean Museums	Tate Gallery, Ashmolean Museum, Manchester City Art Gallery, Bristol City Art Gallery, Aberdeen Art Gallery and Museum, York City Art Gallery, Cleveland Art Gallery
Bronze sculpture by Hans Arp	Wish expressed to go to Tate Gallery	Tate Gallery

Portrait of a Man by Rogier van der Weyden	Conditional—to go to the Home House Trustees on behalf of the Courtauld Institute	467,500

A press notice will be issued to publicise this information.

Export Licences

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts whether he will list the items for which the issuing of export licences was withheld on the recommendation of the Reviewing Committee on the Export of Works of Art during the half year ended 31 December 1986, specifying in each case the valuation and whether an item was eventually exported or retained, with particulars in the latter event of the acquiring institution; whether he will list any items for which licences have been withheld but the final disposal of which is not yet decided, specifying in each case (a) the valuation and (b) the relevant time limit; and whether a press notice will be issued from the Office of Arts and Libraries covering the comprehensive information given in his reply, in accordance with the practice established on 6 February 1986.

Mr. Luce: The items for which export licences were withheld for a period on the advice of the Reviewing Committee on the Export of Works of Art are as follows. The valuation has been omitted in two cases when the owner wished it to remain confidential. Details of the items listed were given in press notices issued at the time of the Minister's decision; however, a further press notice will be issued.

Description of item	Valuation £	Outcome
A silver cup and cover by Joseph Preedy	28,500	Licence suspended for three months. Purchased by the Victoria and Albert Museum.
A self portrait by Hans Leonhard Schaufelein	133,800	Licence suspended for three months. Licence granted.
A Lambeth Delft figure of Apollo c. 1679	60,885	Licence suspended for three months until 28 January 1987
A marble bust of Shakespeare by John Michael Rysbrack	307,260	Licence suspended for six months until 28 April 1987 following a review of the situation two months after the beginning of the export stop.
A statue of Diana by Nollekens	97,707	Licence suspended for three months until 28 January 1987.
A painting "An extensive view of Salisbury" English school c. 1780	—	Licence suspended for five months to 2 May 1987
A portrait of Lord George Stuart, Seigneur D'Aubigny by Sir Anthony Van Dyck	—	Licence suspended for three months to 2 March 1987.
The Achavrail armlet	100,000	Licence suspended for three months to 2 March 1987.
Three Anglo Saxon burial urns	5,500	Licence suspended for three months to 2 March 1987.
An Anglo Saxon black clay vessel with lid of bulbous form	6,000	Licence suspended for three months to 2 March 1987.

Museums and Galleries (Attendance)

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts whether he will publish in the Official Report the attendance figures for 1986 reported by the National Museum and Galleries in England for which he is responsible, broken down to the individual institutions but comprising their outstations, with figures in each case of the percentage increase or decrease on the attendance figures for 1985; and whether, in the case of the National Maritime Museum, he will in addition specify the number of admission tickets sold.

Mr. Luce: For the 10 national museums and galleries for which I am responsible, the information requested is as follows:

	Estimated attendance in 1986	Percentage change from 1985
British Museum	3,869,639	− 6·6
Imperial War Museum	1,175,834	− 9·0
National Gallery	3,182,365	+ 0·8
National Maritime Museum	380,099	−36·6
National Portrait Gallery	624,520	+21·0
Science Museum	4,838,462	+ 5·0
Tate Gallery	1,153,355	+15·7
Victoria and Albert Museum	1,439,636	−30·4
Wallace Collection	170,797	− 4·7
National Museums and Galleries on Merseyside	1,163,304	[1]

[1] Because of the reorganisation of Museums and Galleries on Merseyside, figures cannot be compared with earlier years.

The National Maritime Museum sold 363,983 tickets in 1986, a drop of 19·7 per cent. on 1985. The level of charge remained constant for 1985 and 1986. A number of factors contributed to the overall reduction in visitor levels. Other museums record visitors by a variety of methods, and in most cases are regarded as being accurate to within 5 per cent. only. This limits the interpretation of apparent annual changes in attendance, which may also be affected by other factors including, for example, the numbers of overseas visitors to London at individual museums and galleries.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Income Tax

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is his estimate of the cost of issuing an income tax return form for every taxpayer every year;

(2) what ways of getting information about a taxpayer's income sources other than issuing an income tax return to him the Inland Revenue is examining.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Shipping Industry (Capital Allowances)

Sir William Clark asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has as to the annual pattern of capital allowances arising over a 10-year period for each £100 million of investment in British-owned merchant ships under the tax regime for investment in shipping currently in force; and if he will give the same information in relation to the schemes for 50 per cent., 75 per cent. and 100 per cent. capital allowances, respectively, proposed by the shipping industry.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Tombstones

Mr. Walters asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much value added tax was collected on the sale of tomb headstones during the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Brooke: I regret that information is not available on which to base an estimate.

Mr. Walters asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will consider reviewing the question of tax on tombstones, in view of the additional distress this may cause to bereaved relatives of the deceased.

Mr. Brooke: This has been considered on a number of occasions, but the conclusion has always been that the relief in this area should be limited to the basic cost of funerals and that it should not extend to commemorative items, the provision of which has been regarded as a matter of choice rather than necessity.

Mr. Walters asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the classification of tomb headstones as non-essential goods and therefore liable to value added tax.

Mr. Brooke: A small number of individual letters are received each year from hon. Members and members of the public.

Funeral and Cremation Services

Mr. Walters asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the funeral and cremation services that are exempt from value added tax.

Mr. Brooke: Group 8 of schedule 6 to the VAT Act 1983 has the effect of exempting essential supplies associated with burials and cremations: these include the services of the undertaker, the supply of coffins, urns and caskets, the digging of graves and the disposal of ashes. It does not cover discretionary expenditure such as gravestones or flowers.

Personal Taxation

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of retirement pensioners are higher rate taxpayers.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1987, c. 231]: It is estimated that about 1·7 per cent. of married couples and single people aged over 65 will be liable to higher rate tax in 1986-87.

WALES

Labour Statistics

8. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest unadjusted figures for unemployment in (a) Newport, (b) Gwent and (c) Wales; and if he will give the equivalent figures for 1979 on the most nearly comparable basis.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: On 11 December 1986, the total numbers of unemployed claimants in the Newport travel-to-work area, Gwent and Wales were 12,558, 27,923 and 173,546 respectively. Unadjusted figures for 1979 are not available on a comparable basis.

Unoccupied School Places

9. Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many unoccupied school places there are in primary and in secondary schools in Wales and in Clwyd.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: At January 1987, there are estimated to be 16,700 unoccupied primary places and 5,200 secondary places in Clwyd and 99,400 unoccupied primary places and 46,700 secondary places in Wales.

Secondary School Population

10. Mr. Grist asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the fall in the secondary school population in Wales for the last three and the estimates for the next five years.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Secondary pupil numbers fell by some 13,700 between January 1984 and January 1986. They are estimated to fall by a further 33,100 by January 1991.

Opencast Mining

11. Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he next intends to meet the chairman of British Coal to discuss the forthcoming application for opencast mining at Pont Einion, Northop.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: This proposal will be for Clwyd county council to consider, as mineral planning authority. It would not be proper for me to meet an applicant for planning permission to discuss his application.

Orthopaedic Operations (Mid Glamorgan)

12. Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of waiting lists for orthopaedic operations in the Mid Glamorgan area health authority.

Mr. Mark Robinson: At 30 September 1986, 1,586 people were waiting for in-patient trauma and orthopaedic treatment in Mid Glamorgan health authority.

Houses (Multiple Occupation)

13. Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what action he proposes to improve conditions in houses in multiple occupation in Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Local authorities already have wide powers to control conditions in houses in multiple occupation. In the light of recently completed research commissioned by the Government, I am considering how I can further encourage authorities to use their powers and am seeking to identify any areas of specific concern where further action may be necessary.

Rail Operations (North Wales)

14. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met the chairman of British Rail to discuss rail operations in north Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend last met the chairman on 25 November and discussed a number of matters with him, including rail services in north Wales.

Unemployment (Cynon Valley)

15. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his plans to combat unemployment in the Cynon valley and the rest of Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Government will continue to reinforce the range of policies, including the valleys initiative from which the Cynon valley benefits, and which in the last year have produced a steady fall in unemployment in Wales and have helped to achieve record factory allocations, large-scale investment and substantial growth in the number of new businesses.

Hypothermia

16. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the number of deaths in Wales each winter since 1979 due to hypothermia.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The numbers of deaths whereby hypothermia is mentioned on the death certificate in Wales during the period January-March in each year from 1979 to 1986 were 52, 21, 22, 38, 10, 20, 35 and 25 respectively.

Enveloping Schemes (Ynys Môn)

17. Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the impact of the enveloping schemes adopted in Ynys Môn.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Ynys Môn borough council's activities in enveloping are praiseworthy and four schemes have already brought about external renovation of 239 houses at a total cost of £1·5 million. I hope both these and enveloping schemes elsewhere in Wales will encourage those activities which have yet to employ this most useful renovation technique.

Dual Carriageway

18. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many miles of dual carriageway he expects to open in Wales in 1987.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: 11.3 miles comprising the A48 Cross Hands-Llanddarog by-pass and A483 Ruabon by-pass and Wynnstay link.

Assisted Places Scheme

20. Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of total spending in Welsh schools is represented by expenditure on the assisted places scheme in Wales in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In 1985-86, expenditure on the assisted places scheme in Wales represented 0·126 per cent. of the total spending in Welsh maintained schools.

Water Charges

21. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he next intends to meet the chairman of the Welsh water authority to discuss the recently introduced changes to water charges.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Ministers reguarly meet the chairman of the Welsh water authority to discuss financial and other matters. Charges are among the topics we discussed at the most recent meeting last October. The Welsh water authority has still to decide the level of charges for 1987-88.

Milk Quotas

22. Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will outline the steps he proposes to take to stop the outflow of milk quotas from the dairy farming areas of south-west Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have no plans to take such steps. In the period 1 April 1985 to 17 November 1986, a net 4·2 million litres of quota were transferred out of south Wales, which represents only 0·4 per cent. of the total quota allocated to holdings in south Wales.

Powys Area Health Authority

23. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Wales what additional revenue income he proposes to allocate to Powys area health authority in the financial year 1987-88; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: In 1987-88, Powys district health authority will have a revenue allocation of nearly £25 million, an increase of just under 6 per cent. over 1986-87 over the previous year. Included in this is a special addition of £39,000 in view of the authority's restricted scope for generating additional revenue income, which is only likely to amount to about £17,000 in the year in question.

Cardiff Dock

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total estimated expenditure on the proposed Cardiff dock harbour scheme.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: It is not possible at this stage to make a precise estimate of total expenditure. However, expenditure by the proposed Cardiff Bay development corporation is expected to be about £45 million in the period 1987-88 to 1989-90 and private sector investment is expected to be several times that amount over the period of the development.

District Councils (Expenditure)

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the current total annual expenditure of district councils in Wales for grant purposes.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In 1986-87 the total expenditure of district councils in Wales for block grant purposes was budgeted to be £240·9 million.

Cervical Cancer

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list, by health authority, the time taken for individual smear tests for cervical cancer to be analysed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information requested is not available centrally.

National Museum of Wales

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will publish in the Official Report the attendance figures for 1986 reported by the National Museum of Wales, comprising its outstations, together with the percentage increase or decrease on the attendance figures for 1985.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: A total of 712,267 people visited the National Museum of Wales during 1986, a decrease of 6·9 per cent. on the attendance figures for 1985.

Health Education

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will consider setting up a new generalist Welsh health promotional body to encompass all aspects of health education provision in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 16 January.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what funds have been made available by his Department for health education in Wales in each year since 1979.

Mr. Mark Robinson: There is a health education element to many projects funded under a number of schemes operated by the Department. Finance for main initiatives is as follows:—

	£000
1978-79	176·2
1979-80	192·0
1980-81	221·8
1981-82	384·7
1982-83	457·2
1983-84	622·5
1984-85	693·3
1985-86	1,132·2
[1]1986-87	1,495·4

[1] Best estimate but not of full year cost.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to receive the report of the review of the Health Education Advisory Committee for Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: In view of the reply by my right hon. Friend on Friday, 16 January, announcing the establishment of a special health authority with responsibility for health education in Wales, it has been decided not to pursue the review of the Health Education Advisory Committee for Wales.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what initiatives his Department have supported in health education since 1983; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The Department has instigated and supported a great many initiatives either through grant aid or advisory services since 1983. Health education is an element of numerous local and national schemes, not all of which can be identified separately.

Identifiable support has been centred on the work of the Health Education Council in Wales, such as Heartbeat Wales, the Welsh AIDS Campaign, cancer screening, alcohol abuse and the work of voluntary bodies such as Action on Smoking and Health and Council of Wales of Voluntary Youth Services. A major Welsh Office initiative has been the campaign to combat drug misuse. Most recent has been the announcement of 16 January by the Secretary of State to establish a special health authority in Wales with responsibility for health education.

M4 (Signs)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report a list of those tourist or historic attractions which are signposted on the M4.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: There are no tourist or historic attractions signposted on the M4 in Wales. In the light of the new signing scheme brought in last year it is open to operators of attractions with 75,000 visitors a year to apply for signs.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what arrangements are made to ensure that the illuminated hazard warning signs on the M4 motorway are switched off immediately after the hazard has been removed.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Operation of the illuminated hazard warning signs on the M4 motorway in Wales is a matter for the appropriate police force.

Roadworks (Warnings)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he is satisfied with the standard of advance hazard warning signs on approaches to roadworks in Wales;

(2) if he is satisfied with the standard of advance hazard warning signs on approaches to roadworks on the M4 motorway.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: We are satisfied that the national signing standards which specify the way in which motorists should be forewarned of roadworks are known and used by those undertaking roadworks in Wales. The day-to-day monitoring of such signs is the responsibility of contractors and the highway authority's representative on site. Occasionally checks are carried out by local highway auhority engineers or Welsh Office engineers in the case of trucks and the motorway in Wales.

M4 (Lighting)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to ensure that overhead lighting is installed on the M4 motorway whenever carriageway repairs are being undertaken.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Where lengthy periods of repair work are required on the M4 motorway and where one carriageway is closed and the other in use for two-way traffic, temporary overhead lighting is required to be provided at crossover points. We have no plans to extend this requirement.

Road Safety Education

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if all schools in Wales are complying with the Vienna conference of Transport Ministers (1971) recommendation that a minimum number of hours, between 10 and 20, should be allocated for road safety education on the basis of the scale drawn up by the Vienna conference for the different classes and levels.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is not available.

Mental Illness

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the number of beds for the treatment of mental illness in Wales in (a) 1972, (b) 1982 and (c) the latest available year for (i) general hospitals, (ii) mental hospitals and (iii) other residential facilities.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Information on the numbers of beds and places available for the treatment of mental illness in Wales is given in the following table:

	1972	1982	1985
National Health Service hospitals
Non-psychiatric hospitals [1] [2]	154·2	307·8	474·8
Psychiatric hospitals [1] [2]	6,467·3	4,741·9	4,353·5
Private hospital/nursing homes [3]	n/a	43	89
Local authority, voluntary and private residential homes [4]	n/a	713	603

[1] The specialties included are mental illness, psychiatric children, adolescent psychiatry, psycho-geriatric and elderly mentally infirm.
[2] Average daily available beds for year ending 31 December.
[3] Available beds as at 31 December.
[4] Number of available places as at 31 March.

Health Expenditure

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give (a) total gross expenditure on the National Health Service, (b) revenue expenditure on hospital and community health service and (c) capital expenditure on hospital and community health services, for each year since 1974-75 in cash terms and adjusted by the gross domestic product deflator and National Health Service pay and prices index.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information is given in the following tables:

Total NHS Gross Expenditure

£ million

Year	Cash (1)	Adjusted to 1985-86 prices by GDP deflator (2)	Adjusted to 1985-86 prices by NHS pay and prices index (3)

1985-86	54·7	54·7	54·7

Gross NHS expenditure includes income from sales of surplus land and property. No separate NHS pay and price factors are maintained for Wales. The figures at column 3 have been constructed using pay and price indices maintained for England by the Department of Health and Social Security.

Prescription Charges and Pharmaceuticals

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will update the information on prescription charges and the cost of pharmaceuticals given on 12 December 1985, Official Report, columns 699-700, by giving figures for subsequent years up to the most recent available date.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information required is set out in the following table:

	1985 1st Quarter	1985 2nd Quarter	1985 3rd Quarter	1985 4th Quarter	1986 1st Quarter	1986 2nd Quarter	1986 3rd Quarter	1985-86

Welsh Photographic Museum

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the composition of the working party he has set up to examine the location of the Welsh photographic museum.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The working party has been set up by the National Museum of Wales and also comprises the National Library of Wales, Swansea city council, the Welsh Arts Council and the Royal Institution of South Wales.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if Lliw Valley borough council has been consulted by his Department regarding the location of the Welsh photographic museum; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No. It is for the working party to decide who to consult.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a breakdown of the estimates of his Welsh office for 1987-88, as published in table 2-3 of the "Autumn Statement", Cmnd. 14, indicating how his estimated spending for that year of £3,190 million will be distributed between the various functions within his responsibility, and also showing the expected 1986-87 autumn spending for each of these functions.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I refer the hon. Gentleman to table 3.17 of "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1987-88 to 1989-90" (Cmnd. 56-II).

National Health Service

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the present state of the National Health Service in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: There have been considerable medical advances and service improvements in the NHS in Wales since 1979. The growth in recurrent revenue resources allocated to district health authorities over this period now amounts to 33 per cent. after adjustment for inflation using the GDP deflator; and over the same period capital provision of £490 million, at 1987-88 prices, has been made available. I am satisfied that this amounts to significant achievement

NORTHERN IRELAND

Ulster Museum

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will publish in the Official Report the attendance figures for 1986 reported by the Ulster Museum, comprising its outstations, together with the percentage increase or decrease on the attendance figures for 1985.

Dr. Mawhinney: In 1986, 290,500 people visited the Ulster Museum and the Armagh county museum, an increase of less that 1 per cent. on the attendance figure for 1985.

Prescription Charges and Pharmaceuticals

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will update the information on prescription charges and the cost of pharmaceuticals given on 12 December 1985, Official Report, columns 730-2, by giving figures for subsequent years up to the most recent available date.

Mr. Viggers: The information requested on prescriptions dispensed by chemist contractors and appliance suppliers is as follows:

Strip Searches

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many strip searches were made of female prisoners in Her Majesty's prison, Maghaberry, in July, August, September, October, November and December 1986, respectively; if he will give the number of persons involved and the number of times each person was searched; whether any prison contraband, smuggled item or illegal correspondence was discovered in any search, indicating which items; in how many cases prisoners refused to be searched and had to be restrained while the search was being concluded; and if he will indicate the reasons for the search, namely, making an appearance attion court on remand (and at which court), attending trial, inter-prison visit or other reasons.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is as follows:

Prisoners (Police Maltreatment)

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what were the number of allegations of police maltreatment of prisoners held in their custody under the emergency provisions in Northern Ireland during the years 1975 to 1985 on a year-by-year basis; how many investigations were held; and how many of the allegations were upheld during the same years, again on a year by year basis;

(2) what was the number of allegations of police maltreatment of prisoners in their custody in Northern Ireland other than under emergency powers during the years 1975 to 1985 on a year-by-year basis; how many investigations were held; and how many of the allegations were upheld during the same years, again on a year by year basis.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Convictions (Statistics)

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the number of those convicted on a year-by-year basis since 1975 on uncorroborated contested confession evidence.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Health Services

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give (a) the total gross expenditure on health services, (b) total expenditure on the hospital and community health service, (c) revenue expenditure on the hospital and community health service, (d) capital expenditure on the hospital and community health service, (e) expenditure on family practitioner services, (f) expenditure on centrally funded services and (g) expenditure on personal social services for each year since 1974-75 in cash terms and adjusted by the gross domestic product deflator and the relevant indexes of pay and prices.

Mr. Viggers: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Welsh Grand Committee

36. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Lord Privy Seal whether he has any plans to bring forward proposals for a change in the role of the Welsh Grand Committee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: I have no such plans at present.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Housing Benefit

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of supplementary benefit recipients do not receive housing benefit.

Mr. Lyell: About 28 per cent.
[Source: Quarterly statistical inquiry, February 1986.]

Drug Misuse (Campaign)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's evaluation of their drug misuse prevention campaign in 1986 and on future proposals.

Mrs. Currie: Market research designed to evaluate the drug misuse prevention campaign for the financial year 1986-87 has recently been undertaken and we expect to receive the report shortly. I will place a summary of the report in the Library. We will be considering plans for the future of the campaign in the light of that evaluation.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report for each health authority in England (a) the total number of ambulances in service, (b) the number of ambulances that meets the Department of Health and Social Security guidance of 140,000 miles and seven years and (c) the number of ambulances that do not meet the Department of Health and Social Security guidance of 140,000 miles and seven years.

Mr. Newton: The table shows, for each National Health Service regional health authority, the numbers of all types of ambulance vehicles in use in the last year for which these figures are available. I regret that information is not collected centrally on the length in service or mileage completed by ambulances used by health authorities in England.

Mental Illness

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the number of beds for the treatment of mental illness in England in (a) 1972, (b) 1982 and (c) the latest available year for (i) general hospitals, (ii) mental hospitals and (iii) other residential facilities.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Prescription Charges and Pharmaceuticals

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will update the information given on 13 January 1986, Official Report, columns 501-2, on prescription charges and the cost of pharmaceuticals by giving figures for subsequent years up to the most recent available date.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will update the reply of 21 July 1986, Official Report, column 100, by giving for 1985 the figures for the available number of beds daily by region with a breakdown for acute, maternity and geriatric, and so on.

Mrs. Currie: The information for 1985 is given in the table.

AIDS

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what conveniently available figures he has for the cost of treatment for one year of an AIDS victim.

Mr. Newton: The average cost of hospital in and out-patient treatment of an AIDS patient in England has been estimated to be between £10,000 and £20,000 from diagnosis to death. Further work is being undertaken on costs generally.

Benefits

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the average expenditures per week on food for the following supplementary benefits claimants: (a) an adult, (b) a person 16 to 17 years of age, (c) a child 11 to 15 years of age, and (d) a child under 11 years of age as recorded by the "Family Expenditure Survey" in 1984; and what are these average expenditures, adjusted for inflation in 1985 and 1986.

Mr. Major: I regret that the information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the latest available figures for pensioners in receipt of supplementary benefit, households with a child under the age of two years in receipt of supplementary benefit, and households with a chronically sick or disabled person in receipt of supplementary benefit in Thurrock, together with the overall latest available figures for supplementary benefit recipients in Thurrock.

Mr. Lyell: Thurrock is covered for social security purposes by the Department's local office at Grays. The following information only is available about people receiving supplementary benefit from that office otherwise than at disproportionate cost.

	Number
Number of pensioners receiving supplementary pension	3,818
Total number of people receiving supplementary benefit	11,723

Source: 100 per cent. count of cases in action on 16 December 1986.

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the maternity benefits available in the United Kingdom and all other European Economic Community countries giving (i) the rates at which these are paid, (ii) the duration of payment and (iii) the qualifying conditions for each benefit.

Mr. Lyell: I refer the hon. Member to section I of the Department's publication, "Tables of Social Benefit Systems in the European Communities (Position at 1 January 1986)", a copy of which is in the Library.

Food (Expenditure)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the data base used by his Department to determine the average expenditures on food, referred to in clause 4736 of "Guidelines for SBO's and Procedural Instructions—Supplementary Benefits" ('S' Manual), in the calculation of the extra costs of special diets.

Mr. Major: These figures are provided by the chief adjudication officer as part of his guidance to the independent adjudication officers. The amounts were originally derived from the 1979 family expenditure survey and have subsequently been increased in line with the food element of the retail price index. They were last increased in November 1985.

Children's Homes

Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he intends to take, in the light of the recent attempts at arson at Worth House, Herne Bay, and public complaints concerning the standard of supervision at Ava Lodge, Sydney House School, Westgate-on-Sea, to implement powers of inspection of private children's homes and to ensure that these and similar establishments are adequately staffed at all times by qualified personnel and properly run.

Mrs. Currie: There are differences between the two establishments named by my hon. Friend, although I understand that they are in common ownership. They were the subject of a joint visit by an officer of the social services inspectorate and Her Majesty's inspectors of schools in September 1986.

Worth House is a privately run home and therapeutic centre for young people with emotional and other problems, most of whom are in the care of local authorities.

Regulations providing power of registration and governing the conduct of privately run children's homes accommodating at least one child in the care of a local authority will be introduced later this year. There are existing powers under section 74 of the Child Care Act 1980 which provide for the inspection of premises accommodating children in care and the children themselves, but these do not provide a power of registration or closure. The powers under section 74 are in addition to the duty of placing authorities to consider the needs of children in their care and to determine the most suitable and appropriate placement for them.

Sydney House School, Westgate-on-Sea, has been registered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science as an independent school under part 3 of the Education Act 1944. Under section 77 of the Act such establishments are open to inspection by Her Majesty's inspectors of schools.

Private Medicine

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will state the total income received from private patients for each year since 1979 by each health district region by region.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Junior Hospital Doctors

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is his Department's estimate of the effect of the implementation of the new medical manpower plans on the hours worked by junior doctors;

(2) what is his policy in relation to the proposed goal of 80 hours work a week maximum for junior hospital doctors recommended by the Social Services Committee in 1981.

Mr. Newton: I assume the hon. Member means 80 hours on duty. The Government have taken positive steps to encourage reductions in the excessive hours traditionally required of some junior doctors. We have banned rotas requiring juniors to be on duty on average more than one night and one weekend in two, and initiated a review of rotas more onerous than one in three. We estimate that the number of such rotas in England was reduced by some 30 per cent.—from 5,000 to 3,500—between 1983 and 1985. Average hours of duty have fallen from 91·3 in 1976 to 85·9 in 1986, while independent surveys show that the average number of hours actually worked fell from 58·3 to 57 between 1981 and 1985. We have set rotas of one in three, roughly equivalent to 84 hours' duty, as a target maximum commitment for the future, and we expect health authorities to keep the need for remaining onerous rotas under continuing review.

We also want to see the hospital service developed in ways that are less heavily reliant on junior doctors. We have undertaken wide consultations on a package of measures to improve hospital medical staffing, and are now considering the outcome with representatives of the profession.

These proposals should make it possible substantially to reduce the numbers of doctors in the training grades, but will not necessarily in themselves lead to a reduction in average hours of work.

NHS (Expenditure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report an index showing the movement in National Health Service pay and prices as affecting (a) revenue spending, (b) capital spending and (c) total spending for each calendar year since 1970, expressing 1970 as 100; and if he will publish another table giving that information for each financial year.

Mr. Newton: The available information is shown in the table. These indices are not available on a calendar year basis. Figures on a financial year basis are available from 1971-72.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each health authority the percentage rise or fall in the total hospital waiting list between September 1982 and March 1986, ordered so that the health authority with the biggest increase is first and that with the biggest decrease is last, giving the numbers waiting in each health authority at those two points.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Brook Hospital

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what alternative specialist treatment and transport arrangements exist for patients in south-east Kent in the event of transfer of the neurological services at the Brook hospital.

Mrs. Currie: In the event of the transfer of the neurological service at the Brook hospital, medical manpower will be deployed more effectively so that out-patient sessions in local hospitals will be increased. Steps will also be taken to provide a high standard of training to cope with head injuries in all major accident and emergency departments to which patients are first referred.

The Brook and Maudsley hospitals are no more than seven miles apart, an additional journey of about 15 minutes on average for patients from south-east Kent who would continue to be conveyed to the new location by the ambulance service.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table indicating the total number of persons in Wales who have received the special heating payment for the week 12-18 January, analysed by each of the following categories (a) persons over 65 years of age, (b) persons registered as chronically sick or disabled and (c) families with children under two years of age.

Mr. Leadbitter asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the number of persons in England who have received the special heating payment for 12 to 18 January in the age group categories and qualifications used by his Department; and if he will provide the same information for Cleveland county and Hartlepool.

Mr. Major: The information is not available. Local offices will be asked to make a return at the end of the winter period of the total number of payments and amounts paid.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will reconsider the use of RAF Valley as the centre for measuring the local temperature for the Arfon borough area for the purposes of paying the special heating allowance; and if he will find a suitable location at Llanberis, Deiwiolen or Dinorwig for taking such readings.

Mr. Major: RAF Valley weather station was chosen in consultation with the Meteorological Office as being nearest to the main population centres in the area.

I understand that there are no weather stations which could be used in Llanberis, Deiwiolen or Dinorwig.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what allowance is made in temperature readings taken at Trawsfynydd for determining the elegibility of persons living at the Dwyfor and Meirionnydd districts for special heating payments, to take account of the relatively higher temperatures experienced at Trawsfynydd arising from use of the lake as a coolant for the nuclear power station in that vicinity.

Mr. Major: No special adjustments are made in the temperatures recorded at the Trawsfynydd weather station for the purposes of the exceptionally cold weather scheme.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to remove the £500 capital rule for severe weather payments for pensioners, households with a child under two years of age or with a chronically sick or disabled person; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden) on 25 November 1986 at column 191.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give (a) the minimum night temperature, (b) the daily mean temperature, (c) the weekly mean temperature for each of the weather stations used for calculating severe weather payments for the week 5 January to 11 January inclusive.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his replies, 15 and 16 January]: The following table gives information on the minimum night temperatures for the week 5 to 11 January inclusive, recorded at the 63 weather stations used to operate the new arrangements.

Mr. S. R. Edwards (Child Benefit)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the arrears of child benefit will be paid to Mr. S. R. Edwards, as promised in the letter of 16th July 1986 from the child benefit centre to Mr. Edwards; and whether he will explain why it has taken such a long time to pay this money to Mr. Edwards.

Mr. Lyell: This was a complex case but the arrears of benefit have now been paid. I am sending a detailed reply to the hon. Member's letter of 24 December 1986.

Drug Addicts

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why he proposes to make plastic rather than glass syringes available to drug addicts at the centres announced in his answer of 18 December to the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) Official Report, column 703.

Mrs. Currie: Glass syringes require sterilisation between use. Experience has shown that injecting drug misusers do not always follow sterilising procedures when using injecting equipment.

Plastic syringes are for single use only and will help to reduce the risk of infection caused by the sharing of injecting equipment.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which special health authorities have beds available in special in-patient units for drug misusers.

Mrs. Currie: At December 1985 National Health Service returns indicated that there was a special unit exclusively for the in-patient treatment of drug dependence in Bethlem Royal and Maudsley special health authority hospital.

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many in-patient beds there are for registered drug addicts in Avon; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: On 31 December 1985 there were no special units in Bristol and Weston, Frenchay or Southmead district health authorities for the in-patient treatment of drug misusers. Most people admitted for drug misuse are treated in general psychiatric wards and not in beds specifically assigned for drug misuse.

Diabetics

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether diabetics requiring insulin injections will be precluded from obtaining disposable syringes or needles from the centres announced in his Answer of 18 December to the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) Official Report, column 703; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The schemes refered to in my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) on 18 December at column 703 are being set up specifically to counter the spread of the AIDS virus among injecting drug misusers. Any exchange of used and possibly infected needles and syringes will be accompanied by advice and counselling for the individual's drug misuse problem and about AIDS and the risks of infection through the use of contaminated equipment.

If single use or disposable syringes and needles are necessary for diabetic treatment they may be supplied through the hospital service. Free reusable syringes and needles are supplied to all diabetic patients requiring them.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services pursuant to the answer of 15 December 1986, Official Report, column 415, whether he had on that date already received a copy of the survey results distributed to the members of the equal opportunities task force of the King Edward's hospital fund on 24 November 1986.

Mrs. Currie: No. We have not received a copy of the survey which, from inquiries we made of the King Edward's fund task force, I understand is a summary of responses received to letters sent to health authorities about their equal opportunities policies. However, as I explained in my reply to the hon. Member, health authorities were advised when the task force was established not to wait for its advice but to press ahead in accordance with the Commission for Racial Equality's code of practice.

Board and Lodging

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any proposals for relaxing the restrictions on bed and breakfast accommodation and lodging allowances for the duration of the present cold spell.

Mr. Major: There is already an extensive list of exemption from the time limits on supplementary benefits board and lodging payments to protect vulnerable groups, such as the long-term sick and disabled. There is also a discretionary power to exempt in individual cases to prevent exceptional hardship.

Consultants

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his Department's estimate of the impact of maintaining consultant expansion at 2 per cent. per annum or the 1982 goal.

Mr. Newton: The Government's response to the Social Services Committee's 1981 report on medical education suggested that health authorities should adopt the targets of doubling consultant numbers, and achieving a ratio of 1·8 consultants per junior, by 1996. This would have required consultant expansion of rather over 4 per cent. combined with substantial reductions in junior numbers. Subsequent experience showed that these targets were unrealistic, in part because they did not take sufficient account of the need to provide continuous, safe 24-hour cover in the acute specialties. The proposals in "Hospital Medical Staffing: Achieving a Balance" address this problem, and in addition set forward specific measures for boosting the rate of consultant expansion above the rate of 2 to 2·5 per cent. per annum achieved in recent years.

Dispensing

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, further to his reply to the hon. Member for Carmarthen, 15 December, Official Report, columns 411-12, he will hold discussions with retail pharmacists in order to improve the availability of facilities for the urgent dispensing of prescriptions so designated at all times irrespective of customary shop hours.

Mr. Newton: I would consider doing so were any serious problems with the present system to be brought to my attention.

General Practice Finance Corporation

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the level of funding being made available to the General Practice Finance Corporation for the forthcoming financial year; and if he will express in percentage terms the level of increase or decrease which that figure represents when compared to the current budget.

Mr. Newton: In the public expenditure White Paper published on 14 January, the cash limited provision for the General Practice Finance Corporation for the year 1987-88 amounted to £12 million. This figure is about 44 per cent. of the cash-limited provision made in 1986-87. The reasons for this change are set out in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton South-West (Mr. Budgen) on 14 January at column 206.

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to allow the General Practice Finance Corporation to increase its borrowing limit.

Mr. Newton: We are currently considering the General Practice Finance Corporation's application to increase its statutory borrowing limit.

Abortions

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the numbers and percentages of legal abortions at durations of 20 to 28 weeks' gestation and totals by category of premises, statutory grounds and age of women for (a) residents and (b) non-residents of England and Wales for 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Newton: The information is given in the tables.

Health Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for each health authority in each year since 1979 the total number of hospital beds and the number of acute beds.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 8 December 1986, c. 67]: I regret I cannot provide the hon. Member with all the information he seeks. Figures for all the years requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The available information is given in the table.

Average daily number of available beds in NHS hospitals for all specialties and for the acute[1] specialties for years 1979 and 1983.

Advisory Committees

Sir Philip Holland asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list in the Official Report all advisory committees to which he make appointments and which have not been listed in the annual public bodies publication of the Management and Personnel Office; and which have been abolished since the beginning of 1982;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report all advisory committees to which he makes appointments which are not listed in the annual public bodies publication by the Management and Personnel Office of the Cabinet Office.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 9 December 1986, c. 125-26]: I regret that HM(71)49—"Review of the safe handling of foul and infected laundry" was omitted from table 1 in my previous reply.

Sir Philip Holland asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, what is the status of the 25 expert advisory committees listed in columns 587 and 588 of the Official Report for 16 May but not listed in the replies to the hon. Member for Gedling on 9 December.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 15 December 1986 c. 420]:

The information requested is as follows:

Benefits

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people in the London borough of Newham have been in receipt of (a) supplementary benefit, (b) housing benefit in each year since 1979.

Mr. Lyell [pursuant to his reply, 13 January, c. 176]:

(a) Supplementary Benefit

Information is not available in the precise form requested. The London borough of Newham is covered by the Department's offices at Canning Town, Plaistow and Woodgrange Park. The number of people receiving supplementary benefit from these offices on 16 December 1986 (the latest available information) and on similar dates in 1982 (earlier information is not available) to 1985 is as follows:

London Borough of Newham

December	Numbers
1982	26,333
1983	27,767
1984	29,970
1985	31,464
1986	33,836

(b) Housing Benefit

The number of people who were in receipt of housing benefit or rebates or allowances under the former Department of the Environment schemes in the London borough of Newham is as follows:

Year	Rent rebate recipients	Rent allowance recipients	Rate rebate recipients
1979-80	4,583	1,663	10,253
1980-81	4,600	1,632	11,369
1981-82	5,883	1,825	14,033
1982-83	6,800	1,758	13,741
1983-84[1]	18,304	6,709	34,216
1984-85	18,858	8,009	34,270
1985-86	18,573	7,727	34,699
1986-87[2]	18,642	7,500	34,249

DEFENCE

Greenham Common

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide for the most recent date for which he has information (a) the strength of forces stationed at RAF Greenham common, (b) the acreage of the base and (c) the annual budget.

Mr. Stanley: Some 2,000 USAF service personnel are currently stationed at RAF Greenham common. There are also approximately 300 Ministry of Defence personnel at the base comprising both RAF personnel and MOD police.

The base occupies approximately 1,100 acres and the annual cost to the United Kingdom is about £6 million.

Diego Garcia

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide for the most recent date for which he has information (a) the strength of forces stationed at Diego Garcia, (b) the acreage of the base, and (c) the annual budget.

Mr. Stanley: The United Kingdom maintains a naval party of 39 Royal Navy and Royal Marine personnel on Diego Garcia at a total cost of around £1 million a year. United States service men and women on the island totalled 1,733 at the end of December 1986. The total area of the Diego Garcia atoll, which has been set aside for the defence purposes of the United Kindom and United States Governments, is some 11,000 acres. Construction of the island's defence facilities has however been confined within a specified area on the western side.

Royal Arsenal

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) when the future location of the headquarters of the directorate of defence quality assurance was first considered; what factors led to a decision that it should remain at Woolwich; and why the issue has once again been re-opened;

(2) what is the estimated cost of retaining the headquarters of the directorate of defence quality assurance at Woolwich and Bromley compared to moving it to a new site outside south-east England;

(3) how many schemes for the rationalisation and reorganisation of the Royal Arsenal site at Woolwich have been considered since 1974.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Since 1974, the future of the Royal Arsenal has been the subject of a number of studies with terms of reference of varying width. An important step in 1979 was the integration of the quality assurance directorate (fighting vehicles and engineering equipment) with quality assurance directorate (weapons) to form quality assurance directorate (ordnance). That establishment sponsored a further, broader based, rationalisation study which led in 1982-83 to the production of a Woolwich development plan. On the formation of the directorate general of defence quality assurance in 1984, this plan was taken into account in further studies aimed at achieving a rationalisation of accommodation for the whole organisation. Recommendations have been made that Royal Arsenal west is the preferred existing QA location capable of housing the main units of the new organisation, but other locations outside south-east England have to be taken into account before an investment programme of this scale is undertaken. The further appraisal is not yet completed and comparative costing information is therefore not available.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out the annual running costs of the Royal Arsenal site, Woolwich, over each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The current annual cash expenditure by the directorate general of defence quality assurance as site landlord is about £4·7 million. Figures for the 10 earlier years are not readily available.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the various units now based at the Royal Arsenal site at Woolwich, indicating the numbers of employees at each.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The units presently based at the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich and the numbers of their employees are as follows:

	Number of employees
MOD Units
Army Cataloguing Authority	74
Directorate General of Defence Quality Assurance	1,268
Naval Publications Store	96
Air Publications and Forms Store	113
RAF Movements Unit (London)	34
RAF Signals Unit	219
Ministry of Defence Police	68
Non-MOD Units
Books Supply Department (British Library)	52
Her Majesty's Customs and Excise Stores	52
National Maritime Museum	6
Civil Service Catering Organisation	12
Property Services Agency (Department of the Environment)	63

Military Convoy (Accident)

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence when and where an accident to a military convoy took place in Wiltshire on 10 January; what were the points of departure and destination of and the route taken by the convoy; what vehicles were involved; what materials were being carried; on whose orders the convoy was sent; whether the police were consulted before departure; when the police were informed of the incident; when police arrived on the scene; under what authority armed troops cordoned off areas before their arrival; what area was cordoned off; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: A military convoy was involved in a road traffic accident near West Dean in Wiltshire on Saturday, 10 January. It was operating under Ministry of Defence command and control procedures.

I understand that the police were informed immediately of the incident; and that the first police officers arrived at the scene within about five minutes. Traffic diversions were established by the police. In addition, Ministry of Defence personnel assisted the police in restricting access to the area immediately around the accident site to ensure the security of the cargo and to allow recovery operations to continue unhindered. For security reasons, it is not our practice to discuss the make-up of military convoys or the materials carried, or to disclose their routes.

Weapons (Research and Development)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much has been spent on research into, and development of (a) the Spearfish; (b) Stingray, (c) Tigerfish and (d) Stonefish projects in each year since their inception; and what proportion of defence research and development have they represented during that period.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I will write to the hon. Member.

Spearfish Weapons System

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the Spearfish weapons system is a dual-capable system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is assumed that the question refers to the capability of firing Spearfish against both submarine and surface ship targets. I can confirm that Spearfish has been designed and is currently being developed to have both these capabilities.

Research and Development

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence to what degree he can identify regional distribution of his Department's expenditure on research and development; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The regional distribution of Ministry of Defence expenditure on research and development is not separately identified. For estimates of the percentages of total procurement expenditure spent in various regions, I refer the hon. Member to an answer given on 18 December last to my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) at columns 689-90. These estimates refer to direct payments to main contractors and do not take account of payments made to sub-contractors.

Underwater Weapons Systems (Sales)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will state the value of sales of underwater weapons systems by the United Kingdom to other Governments in each year since 1979; if he will list the countries to which there have been such sales; and which systems have been sold to those countries.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It has been the consistent policy of successive Governments not to disclose particulars of defence sales business with other countries, as these are matters of commercial confidentiality.

Torpedo Weapon Systems

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will outline the specific importance of (a) Spearfish, (b) Stingray. (c) Tigerfish and (d) Stonefish weapons to the defences of the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Tigerfish and Stingray are important elements in the maritime layered defence of the United Kingdom and its assets.

It is planned that Spearfish will enhance this capability by keeping pace with Soviet technological advances, when it replaces Tigerfish in the inventory. Stonefish is not in service with the United Kingdom armed forces.

Meteorological Office

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Defence what instructions he has issued to the meteorological office at Bracknell regarding the withholding of information about temperatures; when the instructions were issued; and if he will place a copy of the instructions in the Library.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No instructions have been issued to the meteorological office regarding the withholding of temperature or any other meteorological data. On the contrary, such information is readily available from the office's headquarters at Bracknell and from our various weather centres, subject only to the availability of staff to assemble it and the need to recover a measure of the cost of providing it.

Electromagnetic Pulse

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment his Department has made with regard to the vulnerability of the United Kingdom's early warning systems to the effects of electromagnetic pulse from a nuclear weapon exploding in the atmosphere above the United Kingdom.

Mr. Stanley: The requirements for electromagnetic pulse protection have been and will continue to be assessed in relation to both existing and future early warning systems for the United Kingdom. It would not be in the public interest to provide details.

Polaris Submarines (VLF Link)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether, in the event of the United Kingdom's fixed VLF transmitters being destroyed, the back-up mobile VLF transmitters can provide a guaranteed communication link with the Polaris submarines.

Mr. Stanley: We are entirely satisfied with the plans for the command and control of our strategic deterrent forces in all circumstances.

Pindar and Hawthorn

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what assessment his Department has made as to the survivability of the new bunker control centre, code-named Pindar, if subjected to nuclear ballistic missile attack;

(2) what assessment his Department has made as to the survivability of the Hawthorn underground complex if subjected to nuclear ballistic missile attack.

Mr. Stanley: It would not be in the public interest to comment on matters of this nature.

Ballistic Missile Attack (Warning System)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence how long it would take for the ballistic missile early warning system sites to confirm a ballistic missile attack on the United Kingdom.

Mr. Stanley: Warning time depends on the range, launching point and tragectory of the missile. We believe the time would vary from four to 10 minutes, depending on these factors.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what early warning capability the United Kingdom possesses to detect an attack on the United Kingdom by submarine-launched ballistic missiles from the Arctic ocean region.

Mr. Stanley: An attack on the United Kingdom by ballistic missiles launched from submarines patrolling in the Arctic ocean region would be detected by the BMEWS radars at RAF Fylingdales.

Fylingdales

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions, and for how long on those occasions, the ballistic missile early warning system site at Fylingdales has been out of operation during the past five years.

Mr. Stanley: It would not be in the public interest to give specific details of the operational availability of the ballistic missile early warning system at Fylingdales, but it has proved exceptionally reliable. It has been out of operation for less than three hours in total over the last five years.

Soviet Ballistic Missiles

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of the shortest flight time in which a Soviet ballistic missile could reach the United Kingdom.

Mr. Stanley: The shortest flight time in which a Soviet ballistic missile could reach the United Kingdom is about 10 minutes.

AWACS

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what capability the airborne warning and control system planes have with regard to the detection, tracking and warning of cruise missile attack.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: AWACS has a wide-ranging capability to detect and provide warning of aircraft and missile attacks. Details of its operational performance are, however, classified.

Type 23 Frigate (Command and Control System)

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) when work on the Ferranti command and control system for the type 23 frigate was abandoned; for how long research went on; and how much money has been spent;

(2) what is the timetable for the completion of the replacement for the command and control system for the type 23 frigate;

(3) what steps have been taken to find a replacement for the command and control system for the type 23 frigate; and which companies are involved in the final round of tendering.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Work on the Ferranti command and control system for the type 23 frigate has been under way since the early 1980s, and is continuing. The system is planned for operation from the 1990s.

In line with our policy of introducing competition in procurement, it has recently been decided that development and production work on the system will be put out to competitive tender. Invitations to tender have recently been issued. Following evaluation of these bids, consideration may need to be given to a final round of tendering and in any case one option will be to continue with the present work but under new terms.

It is not the practice to publicise project costs which are commercially confidential between the Ministry of Defence and individual contractors.

Cyprus

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Defence what guidance is issued by the authorities of the sovereign base areas of Akrotiri and Dhekelia in Cyprus to individuals or companies resident in or visiting the base concerning the legal jurisdiction of the sovereign base areas.

Mr. Freeman [pursuant to his answer, 19 December 1986, c. 777]: All British service and civilian personnel posted to Cyprus receive written guidance on the relevant provisions of local law in the sovereign base areas and the Republic of Cyprus. In respect of service personnel, this written guidance is reinforced by oral briefing. The sovereign base areas administration does not issue guidance concerning the legal jurisdiction of the sovereign base areas to others resident and/or working there but copies of the sovereign base areas laws and the treaty of establishment are freely available in public reference libraries in the sovereign base areas.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Taiwanese Goods

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is (a) the value of exports of Taiwanese goods during the last complete year and (b) the value of imports from that country.

Mr. Alan Clark: According to Taiwan statistics their total exports in 1985 amounted to United States $31·4 billion of which United States $0·7 billion went to the United Kingdom.

In the same year, the United Kingdom recorded imports of £583 million (United States $755 million) from Taiwan.

Origin Marking

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make it his policy that goods bearing a United Kingdom name or mark must continue to be marked with their country of origin.

Mr. Howard: For the reasons set out in my reply of 1 December 1986 at columns 434-35 to my hon. Friend, the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), it is not possible to maintain the present requirements of the Trade Descriptions Act 1972. It does, however, remain the Government's policy that consumers should be protected against being misled about the origin of goods and my Department is currently consulting interested parties on the scope for supplementing the protection afforded by the Trade Descriptions Act 1968.

Manufacturing Investment

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the level of manufacturing investment in each year since 1979 expressed as a percentage of the 1979 level.

Mr. Butcher: The information requested is:

Manufacturing Investment (Including Leased Assets)

Year	Percentage of 1979 level at 1980 prices
1980	89
1981	69
1982	68
1983	68
1984	80
1985	85
[1]1986	83

[1] Fourth quarter estimated.

Manufacturing Output

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the level of manufacturing output in each year since 1979 expressed as a percentage of the 1979 level.

Mr. Butcher: The information requested is given in the table:

Index of output of the manufacturing industries (1979 = 100)

	Percentage
1979	100·0
1980	91·3
1981	85·8
1982	86·0
1983	88·5
1984	92·0
1985	94·9
1986[1]	95·1

[1] 1986 figure is the average of the first eleven months of the year.

Company Sequestrations

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many firms in Dundee have gone into sequestration since 1979.

Mr. Howard: From 1979 to 1986 inclusive there were 42 sequestrations in Dundee. The figure covers all individuals and partnerships. A separate figure in respect of firms is not available. Included are cases relating to persons with businesses in Dundee but living outside.

Rolls-Royce

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the amount of the net borrowings of Rolls-Royce plc at 31 December 1986 which the Government intend to subscribe in new ordinary shares as indicated in his answer to the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren) on 18 December 1986, Official Report, columns 607-8.

Mr. John Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, pursuant to his answer of 18 December, Official Report, column 608, he will give the net borrowings of Rolls-Royce as at 31 December 1986.

Mr. Pattie: The figure concerned will not be available until the company's results have been audited and then approved by the directors. This is unlikely to be before the middle of March.

Electrical Safety (Regulations)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on what date he now anticipates the draft regulations concerning the safety of domestic electrical plugs and sockets will come into effect; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The House may recall that in response to a similar question in July of last year from the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) I said that we intended to submit the draft plug and socket regulations to Parliament during the early part of this Session. This is still our intention. However, following further consultation with the electrical industry, it has been agreed that there is a need to allow a longer period for implementation of certain provisions than I then indicated.

In these circumstances and subject to the approval of Parliament the revised timetable for the implementation of the proposed plug and socket regulations is as follows:

1 September 1987: For manufacturers and importers (first suppliers): plugs (other than standard 13 amp), sockets and adaptors covered by the regulations must comply with the relevant British Standard or be approved by a specified person. Standard 13 amp plugs must comply with British Standard 1363: 1984 including Amendments 1 and 2, or provide an equivalent level of safety.

1 March 1988: For manufacturers, importers, wholesalers and retailers: plugs (other than standard 13 amp), sockets and adaptors must comply with the relevant British Standard or be approved by a specified person. Standard 13 amp plugs must comply with British Standard 1363: 1984 including Amendments 1 and 2, or provide an equivalent level of safety.

1 September 1988: Standard 13 amp plugs must be approved by a specified person.

Petrol Prices

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Office of Fair Trading last investigated petrol prices; and when it next intends to do so.

Mr. Howard [pursuant to his reply, 15 January 1987, c. 259]: The Director General of Fair Trading continues to monitor the petrol market following the 1965 and 1979 Monopolies and Mergers Commission monopoly reports on the supply of petrol.

Share Issues (Multiple Applications)

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what investigations have been conducted into multiple applications for shares during the public sale of nationalised industries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I have been asked to reply.

Investigations into suspected multiple applications are made by the receiving banks appointed to process applications in Government share sales and, in certain large sales, by specially appointed firms of auditors. Where appropriate, suspected cases are referred by the Department responsible for the sale to the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions.

There have been 10 successful prosecutions for multiple applications regarding the British Telecom sale. As far as the British Gas sale is concerned, Touche Ross have submitted an interim report on suspected multiple applications to the Department of Energy; investigations also involving the DPP and the Fraud Squad are continuing.

TRANSPORT

National Dock Labour Scheme

Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the effects on the competitive structure of the ports industry of the national dock labour scheme.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Ports to which the dock labour scheme applies suffer the disadvantages of its rigidities and cost, and some of them have had a poor industrial relations record. The growth in recent years of ports outside the scheme must in part reflect these factors. However, it would be very difficult to assess the effect of the scheme, as opposed to other relevant factors, on the comparative competitiveness of our ports.

Remould Tyres

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to provide for departmental powers to control the design and manufacture of remould tyres.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend already has powers to lay down safety requirements for vehicle components before they are put on the market. Under the Motor Vehicle Tyres (Safety) Regulations, 1984, retreaded tyres must be manufactured so as to meet British Standard BS Au 144b.

Severn Bridge

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consultations he is proposing to hold with local authorities and other interested parties about the possibility of closing the Severn bridge for repairs and maintenance at certain times during the summer months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There are no plans to close the bridge for repairs and maintenance during the summer months. Closures of one or both carriageways may be necessary on a few occasions during the major strengthening works, but these are planned for the winter at night times over weekends. The strengthening contract will stipulate strict conditions about lane closures and none will be permited at peak times.

The traffic management strategy during the above works has been discussed in principle by the Severn crossing consultative committee and in detail by the traffic management liaison committee, on both of which local highway and police authorities, users organisations and the industry are represented at official level. These committees will continue to meet regularly to discuss future developments.

In the event of unexpected delays due to planned works, or to unplanned incidents such as high winds and accidents, a strategy for the diversion of traffic on the English side has also been agreed with the police and the local authorities. This strategy will be implemented before the main strengthening work starts. Similar arrangements already operate on the Welsh side of the crossing.

Advance notice and publicity will be given to all planned traffic restrictions, and up-to-date information will be made available to motorists at all times.

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will introduce legislation to provide for the refund of vehicle excise duty when proof exists that a vehicle was incapable of being used but where the licence disc is not available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No. Legislation is not required, since present statutory and administrative arrangements already provide for refunds of vehicle excise duty to be considered where the licence disc is not available. Whether or not the vehicle is capable of use is not normally a consideration.

Smoking (Road Accidents)

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Secretary of State for Transport what medical evidence has now emerged to indicate a correlation between smoking while driving and an increased accident rate.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: None that I am aware of. Our advice remains that if drivers must smoke they should only do so if they can be sure that their ability to concentrate will not at any time be affected.

Greater Manchester PTA (Correspondence)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport when his Department will be replying to the letter sent by the clerk to the Greater Manchester passenger transport authority on 24 December last, under the heading "Precept Limitation—Total Expenditure"; what action he is taking; if he will place copies of the correspondence in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have placed copies of the correspondence in the Library.

Modbury-Bigbury Road (Census)

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria were used in the selection of the Modbury to Bigbury road as a core census site.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Modbury to Bigbury road site was selected (along with six others) at random from all points on class B built-up roads in Great Britain.

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport for how long each day, for how many days in each month, and for how many years, a census site will be maintained on the Modbury to Bigbury road; how much of the traffic so counted is estimated to be travelling by road beyond Bigbury; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The traffic census on the Modbury to Bigbury road is taken for three 16-hour periods each month. Vehicles are not stopped, nor do interviews take place. Manual traffic counts will continue until the Department is able to install suitable automatic traffic counting and classifying equipment. Development of such equipment is in hand and undergoing trials. It is not possible to estimate from traffic counts alone the proportion of traffic using the road beyond Bigbury.

Inflation (Transport Policies)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the effect on the rate of inflation of current Government policies on public passenger transport.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Government's policies on public passenger transport are aimed at greater efficiency, cost effectiveness and increased competition. They will therefore generally lead to lower costs than would otherwise be the case, to the benefit of passengers, ratepayers or taxpayers, or a combination of these.

Roads

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all those road schemes, for which he has issued contracts, but which are either incomplete, or have not begun, showing the cost of each scheme.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to the reply, 10 December 1986, c. 153-4]: I regret that certain errors were contained in that answer. The list should be corrected as follows:

Route	Title	Works cost estimate £ million

The works cost estimates shown above are estimates of total scheme costs in cash terms and in most cases include some non-contract items such as statutory undertakers' fees and other ancillary works items. In the case of some larger schemes, ancillary items are the subject of a separate works contract.

PRIME MINISTER

Pensioners

Q9. Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister when she next proposes to meet representatives of pensioner organisations.

The Prime Minister: I am meeting a delegation from the eighth national pensioners convention on 5 March.

EC (Expenditure)

Q48. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the question of the anticipated expenditure of the European Economic Community in 1987 in comparison with its legal limits of expenditure; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: We shall make clear in every appropriate forum that the Community should contain its expenditure within the legal limits.

State Security

Q94. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she will refer to the Security Commission the matter of the documents relating to national security allegedly bequeathed by the late Anthony Blunt to his brother and held in an institution in London.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to my statement on Mr. Blunt of 21 November 1979, columns 402-10.

Engagements

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 20 January.

Mr. Stern asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 20 January.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 20 January.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 20 January.

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 20 January.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 20 January.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 20 January.

Mr. Lloyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 20 January.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 20 January.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Regional Development Grants

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister if she will publish a table showing forecast spending, at 1986 prices, on regional development grants in (a) England, (b) Scotland and (c) Wales in each year from now until 1989-90; and if she will publish the figures for spending on regional development grants, at 1986 prices, for each year from 1979-80 for England, Scotland and Wales.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, 19 January 1987]: The future provision for expenditure on regional development grants incorporated in the Public Expenditure White Paper, adjusted to 1986 prices[1], is as follows:

£ million

	1987-88	1988-89	1989-90
England	93·3	82·8	89·3
Scotland	63·8	53·4	58·1
Wales	30·5	24·8	24·1
TOTAL	187·6	161·0	171·5

Payments of Regional Development Grants for the years since 1979-80, adjusted to 1986 prices[1], were as follows:

£ million

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	[2]1986-87
England	345·6	379·6	444·7	330·5	252·4	226·1	169·4	191·8
Scotland	115·5	157·1	180·4	338·4	161·3	118·1	109·4	133·8
Wales	83·4	143·5	154·4	143·1	81·4	100·2	85·9	70·8
TOTAL	544·5	680·2	779·5	812·0	495·1	444·4	364·7	396·4

Notes:
[1] Expenditure on a 1986 price basis for each year is calculated by applying the appropriate deflator to expenditure at current prices.
[2] 1986-87 data are provisional and for the first three quarters of the year only.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Telephone Directory

Mr. Higgins asked the Lord Privy Seal why the numerous changes in ministerial telephone numbers were not notified to those responsible for producing the House of Commons telephone directory, so that a new directory could be issued before the changes were made; what Government Department is responsible for such matters; if he will estimate how many man hours have been wasted as a result of this information not being available in a convenient form; and when a directory with the new numbers is now likely to be available.

Mr. Biffen: Each Government Department is responsible for its own arrangements to notify callers when ministerial telephone numbers are changed. The December 1986 issue of the Palace of Westminster telephone directory was submitted for printing in early November at which time no information on the future changes of some ministerial numbers was available.

It is not possible to state how many man-hours have been wasted on account of the lack of information on revised telephone numbers. The Palace of Westminster operators now have an updated list of ministerial telephone numbers shown in the Palace directory and hon. Members may obtain this information by dialling 100. Amended Palace of Westminster directories are produced three times a year; the next issue will be made in April 1987.

NATIONAL FINANCE

European Communities (Own Resources Payment)

Mr. Rowe asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the early payment of non-value added tax own resources to the European Communities in January.

Mr. Brooke: In accordance with article 10(2) of Council Regulation 2891/77, the Commission has requested member states to advance from February the payment of own resources other than VAT in respect of agricultural, sugar and isoglucose levies and customs duties collected by the Government on its behalf.

The Government will accordingly make an advance payment today of some £138 million, in accorance with the European Court of Justice's ruling on 18 December that these requests impose an obligation on member states to comply with them. As I informed the House on 19 December at column 746, the payment will be made from the Consolidated Fund under the terms of section 2(3) of the European Communities Act, 1972. The payment of levies and duties on 20 February will be reduced by the amount of the advance. There will, therefore, be no net addition to forecast public expenditure for 1986-87.

Mr. Higgins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer by what means he proposes to inform the House of a payment of own resources made in advance at the demand of the European Commission, following the decision of the European Court of Justice in case 93/85; and whether the House will be given the opportunity of expressing an opinion on the circumstances which have given rise to the need for the advancing of payments before the transfer is made.

Mr. Lawson [pursuant to the reply, 15 January 1987]: The Government propose to inform the House by means of a parliamentary answer whenever advance payments of levies and duties are made. It will not normally, I fear, be practicable to arrange for the House to debate the surrounding circumstances before such advances are made since requests are usually made at short notice. They arise from temporary cash flow problems and do not involve any increase in public expenditure. Nevertheless, the House will continue to have the opportunity to discuss advance payments and the general financial position in the context of the Government's regular reports and statements to Parliament on Community budgetary matters.

Mr. Higgins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, since the decision of the European Court of Justice in case 93/85 is contrary to the Government's contention that advance payments of own resources to the European Commission require specific parliamentary approval, the United Kingdom intends to propose in the Council of Ministers the amendment or annulment of articles 10 and 11 of Council Regulation 1891/77, so far as they involve an absolute liability to make such payments and impose a penalty for late compliance.

Mr. Lawson [pursuant to the reply, 15 January 1987]: The Government have no plans to make such a proposal. There would, in any case, be no prospect of obtaining agreement to it.

Mr. Higgins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he had made of the extent to which current cash flow problems of the Community are likely to give rise to demands for advance payments of own resources in the present European Community budgetary year.

Mr. Lawson [pursuant to the reply, 15 January 1987]: It is the Government's view that the European Commission's cash flow difficulties are such that it may be required to request advance payments of non-VAT own resources from member states for at least the first quarter of 1987. We have recently received such a request for the advance of February's payment to January. Our assessment is reflected in the public expenditure plans, published in the public expenditure White Paper (Cm 56-II, section 3.3, net payments to European Community Institutions, pages 68-71) on 14 January, in which it is assumed that some £130 million will be drawn forward from 1987-88 to 1986-87.

Arts (Donations)

Mr. Soames asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will summarise in the Official Report what steps he has taken to facilitate the giving of corporate and personal donations to support the arts.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Since 1979 the Government have made very substantial improvements to the tax reliefs for corporate and personal donations to charities, including arts charities. These are as follows:

1980 Budget

Reduction of minimum period for charitable covenants for tax relief from seven to four years.

Introduction of higher rate income tax relief for charitable covenants, originally with £3,000 limit.

1982 Budget

Exemption from stamp duty on charitable covenants and on conveyances and transfers of property of all kinds to a charity.

1983 Budget

Removal of limit for CTT exemption for gifts to charities within one year of death.

Introduction of tax relief for an employee's salary costs met by a company during period of secondment to charity.

Limit on higher rate income tax relief for charitable covenants increased to £5,000.

1984 Budget

Tax relief for an employee's salary costs met by an unincorporated employer during period of secondment to charity.

1985 Budget

Limit on higher rate income tax relief for charitable covenants increased to £10,000.

1986 Budget

Limit on higher rate relief for charitable covenants abolished.

Income tax relief introduced from April 1987 for charitable donations made by direct deductions from wages and salaries under approved payroll giving schemes.

Corporation tax relief introduced for single donations by companies (other than close companies) to charities, up to a maximum of 3 per cent. of dividends paid by company in relevant accounting year.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will indicate the items of baby equipment upon which value added tax is imposed; and what is the percentage value added tax applied in each case.

Mr. Brooke: All items of baby equipment, other than clothing and footwear, are liable to value added tax at the standard rate (15 per cent.).

Channel Fixed Link

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether French customs and excise officials will undertake on-train customs inspection for (a) passengers and (b) freight using the Channel fixed link; and whether they will travel further than Ashford.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Incomes

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing tax and national insurance contributions less child benefit, where appropriate, for 1986-87, and comparable figures for 1985-86 and 1978-79, with the multiples of average earnings as half, two-thirds, one, five and 10 times for (a) a married couple, with part-time working spouse, (b) a married couple plus two children, with part-time working spouse and (c) a single person;

(2) if he will detail the proportions of pre- and post-tax increases paid to the top 1 per cent., 2 per cent., 3 per cent., 4 per cent., 5 per cent., 10 per cent., 20 per cent., 30 per cent., 50 per cent., and 75 per cent. of taxpayers in 1978-79 and the latest available year; and what this represents in money terms.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

EC Budget

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the most up to date figures for the United Kingdom contribution to the European Economic Commission budget in each year from 1975 (a) at current prices and (b) at 1986 prices.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 15 January 1987]: The figures requested are set out in the table herewith.

£ million

Year	Cash [1]	Constant 1986 prices [2]
1975	−56	−161
1976	167	417
1977	369	810

1986 [5]	326	[4] 326

[1] United Kingdom figures showing payments to the Community budget on a cash flow basis. Budget refunds and abatements are credited to the year in which they are paid.

[2] Constant price figures have been constructed using the GDP deflator.

[3] The 1985 budget contained a flat rate VAT abatement for the United Kingdom of 1,000 mecu (£605 million), payable in respect of the United Kingdom's contribution in 1984. £166 million of this was received by the end of December 1985. The balance, £439 million, was received in the first few days of January 1986. The delay in payment reduced the 1986 figure and increased that for 1985.

[4] The 1986 net contribution is the estimate contained in the Statement on the 1986 Community Budget (Cmnd. 9907) published in October 1986.

ENVIRONMENT

London Docklands

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many existing homes and homes under construction within the area of the London docklands are (a) in or intended for owner-occupation, (b) held by local authorities for letting, (c) held by housing associations for letting, (d) held privately for letting and (e) held for shared ownership schemes.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is given in the table:

Number of existing homes and homes under construction as at 31 March 1986

Description	Number
Owner-occupation	8,578
Local authority lettings	12,840
Housing association lettings	1,527
Private letting	[1]978
Shared ownership	321
TOTAL	24,244

[1] 1981 census figure.

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current estimated population of the London docklands.

Mr. John Patten: The estimated population of the London docklands urban development area at 31 March 1986 was about 42,800.

Housing Statistics

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report for each local authority in England (i) the number of unfit dwellings, (ii) the number of dwellings fit but lacking basic amenities, (iii) the number of non sub-standard dwellings in need of renovation, (iv) the number of difficult to let dwellings, and (v) the total number of dwellings as indicated in form HIP1 submitted with their housing investment programme bid for 1987-88.

Mr. Tracey: The information, which relates to April 1986, is listed in the "HIP1 (1986) all items print" which is available in the Library. The numbers reported are not necessarily comparable as authorities' criteria may differ.

Entry and Search Powers

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many officials for whom he has responsibility currently have the power to enter and search premises, subject to statutory conditions; and, in each case, if he will indicate the statutory authority under which power is exercised.

Mr. Ridley: I may authorise persons to enter and in some cases inspect, but not search, premises under section 6(9) and section 7(6) of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, under section 1(10) and section 7(3) of the Endangered Species (Import and Export) Act 1976 as amended by the Wildlife and Countryside Act and under Regulations 4(3) and 5(2) of the Control of Trade in Endangered Species (Enforcement) Regulations 1985 (SI No. 1155). There are 105 wildlife inspectors who work on a casual, fee-paid, basis and are authorised under these powers.

Her Majesty's radiochemical inspectors has powers under section 12 of the Radio-active Substances Act 1960 to enter premises to carry out inspections. There are 17 radiochemical inspectors.

Sections 280 and 281 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 enable the Secretary of State to authorise persons to enter land for survey or inspection. Planning inspectors are thus authorised, but in practice when site visits are required they are always arranged with the parties concerned. There are 175 full-time salaried planning inspectors and 126 fee-paid inspectors.

Under the Parks Regulations Act 1872, as amended by the Parks Regulation Amendment Acts of 1926 and 1974, royal parks police constables whilst within the royal parks have the same powers as the Metropolitan police. There are 153 royal parks constables.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Sir Johnn Farr asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the operation of the powers bestowed on the Nature Conservancy Council in relation to the establishment of sites of special scientific interest.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes.

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to provide for appeal machinery following designations of sites of special scientific interest under the Wildlife and Countryside Act.

Mr. Waldegrave: This proposal was considered and rejected during the passage of the Wildlife and Countryside Act, 1981 and subsequently by the Environment Committee of this House (first report, Session 1984-85). I am satisfied that existing procedures are adequate.

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if, in view of the recent establishment by the Nature Conservancy Council of sites of special scientific interest on reservoirs in the east Midlands such as Pitsford and Rutland water, restricting or curtailing access by anglers, he will seek an assurance from the Nature Conservancy Council that no further sites of special scientific interest will be created in the area;

(2) before establishing new sites of special scientific interest on reservoirs and other water areas where fishing is enjoyed, what consideration the Nature Conservancy Council gives to the general availability of such fishing in the area.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Nature Conservancy Council has a statutory duty to notify areas which, in its opinion, are of special interest by reason of any of their flora, fauna, or geological or physiographical features. Although angling may be specified as a potentially damaging activity in such areas, the Nature Conservancy Council endeavours to reach agreements which reconcile fishing and conservation interests. I understand that the agreement with Anglian water authority, in the case of Rutland water and Pitsford in fact permits an overall increase in fishing activity, and that two reservoirs in the area, Stamford and Hollowell, have recently been de-notified as sites of special scientific interest.

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why the Nature Conservancy Council has established a site of special scientific interest at Pitsford reservoir, Northants, without prior consultation with anglers and the Federation of Midland Flyfishers.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Nature Conservancy Council is required to notify all owners and occupiers of land in a site which in its opinion, is of special interest. It is impractical to notify, and the Nature Conservancy Council would not necessarily be aware of, others who might be concerned.

Local Authority Housing

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, on the basis of his Department's voluntary inquiry on construction activity, he will give details of local authority starts and completions of dwellings built by direct labour departments in each of the years 1984, 1985 and 1986.

Mr. John Patten: About 80 per cent. of local authorities in England reply to the Department's voluntary quarterly inquiry on construction activity, but only a small proportion of these build dwellings by direct labour. In the period 1 January 1984 to 30 September 1986, local authorities reported as follows although not all responded in every quarter.

Departmental Costs

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total number of staff in his Department on 1 April for each of the years 1985 and 1986; what was the figure for 5 January 1987; and what is the current cost to public funds, including salaries, pensions and overheads of running it.

Mr. John Patten: The total number of staff in the Department of the Environment (Central) at 1 April 1985 and 1986 was 6,560·5 and 6,521 respectively. Staff in post figures are collated for the first of each month. On 1 January 1987 the estimated total was 6,430. The cost of running the Department in 1986-87 is expected to be about £152 million. This includes a notional amount for superannuation payments which are met by the Paymaster General's Office.

Caravans Legislation

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will now review the workings of the Caravans Act 1968 in Surrey, in the light of the growth of the gipsy population in that county in the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: The Department monitors the working of the Caravan Sites Act in Surrey, as elsewhere, and is in touch from time to time with Surrey county council about the implementation of its programme of site provision.

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to review the operation of the Caravans Act 1968; when he intends to announce his conclusions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: We are currently reviewing the operation of the Caravan Sites Act 1968 and expect to announce our conclusions very shortly.

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will now review the operations of the Caravan Sites Act 1960 in respect of the unauthorised occupation of sites.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. I am satisfied that the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960, which prohibits use of land as a caravan site without a site licence, provides local authorities with effective powers to prevent unauthorised use.

London Residuary Body

Mr. Raymsford asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many properties are currently held by the London residuary body in the Fulham constituency; how many of those are empty; and what are the latest proposals for the use or disposal of these properties.

Mr. Chope: These are all matters for which the London residuary body is responsible.

Agricultural Land (Change of Use)

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his Department's estimates of the number of acres of agricultural land likely to become available for other use in each of the next three years; and what change of use he envisages, expressed as a percentage.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have nothing to add to the answer given to my hon. Friend by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 15 January.

Housing (Thurrock)

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the number of completions of units of accommodation by the local authority in the Thurrock constituency in 1983 and 1986.

Mr. Tracey: Information on local authority housebuilding is not kept on a constituency basis. Numbers of new dwellings completed by Thurrock borough council in 1983 and the first half of 1986 appear in issues Nos. 73 and 79 of "Local Housing Statistics" which are available in the Library.

They are as follows:

	Number
1983	149
[1]1986	10

[1] first half

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the amount of the housing improvement programme allocation for Thurrock district council for each year from 1978-79 to 1986-87.

Mr. Tracey: Housing investment programme allocations for Thurrock district have been as follows:

Year	HIP Allocation £000
1978-79	3,424
1979-80	3,607
1980-81	3,101
1981-82	3,093
1982-83	3,217
1983-84	2,900
1984-85	2,849
1985-86	2,396
1986-87	3,207

In addition, the council has been able to use part of its capital receipts.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the number of completions of privately owned units of accommodation in the Thurrock constituency between 1983 and 1986.

Mr. Tracey: Information on private sector housebuilding is not kept on a constituency basis. Numbers of new dwellings completed by the private sector in the Thurrock borough council area in the years 1983 to 1986 appear in issues Nos. 73, 74, 78 and 79 of "Local Housing Statistics" which are available in the Library.

They are as follows:

	Number
1983	431
1984	423
1985	415
1986[1]	188

[1] First half.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the number of units of accommodation owned by Thurrock borough council in the Thurrock constituency between 1983 and 1986.

Mr. Tracey: The information is not held on a constituency basis. The total number of dwellings owned by Thurrock borough council at 1 April 1983 and 1 April 1986 was 16,529 and 15,236.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secrertary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the number of prefabricated concrete cement houses in the Thurrock constituency (a) in private ownership, having been purchased from the local authority in 1986, and (b) continuing in local authority ownership in 1986.

Mr. Tracey: The Council's 1986 housing investment programme return shows that there were 247 prefabricated reinforced concrete houses in the Thurrock borough council area in private ownership at 1 April 1986. It is reasonable to assume that all these were bought from the local authority. The return showed 340 PRC houses in the ownership of the local authority at the same date.

Enterprise Zones

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all moneys paid or revenue deferred in enterprise zones for each year since their establishment in total support and in (a) tax incentive and (b) rates relief for Scotland, Wales and England.

Mr. John Patten: The available information on enterprise zones in Great Britain up to December 1985, including the value of public sector investment and grant payments, the estimated net cost to the Exchequer of capital allowances and payments in respect of rates revenue forgone by local authorities for the years 1981-82 to 1984-85, is contained in "Enterprise Zone Information 1984-85" published in October 1986, copies of which were placed in the Library. Payments in respect of rates revenue forgone in 1985-86 amounted to £25 million.

Local Government Legislation

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report those Acts of Parliament since 1979 concerning (a) local government finance and (b) local authority duties, powers and responsibilities.

Mr. Ridley: A considerable number of public general Acts, not all of them the responsibility of my Department, have some effect on the duties, powers and responsibilities of local authorities, and may thus affect the finances of those authorities. A list of the more major Acts since 1979 is set out below. Acts concerned purely with finance or of major significance in connection with local government finance generally are marked with an asterisk:

1979
- Education Act (c. 49)
- Weights and Measures Act (c. 45)

1980
- Education Act (c. 20)
- Highways Act (c. 66)
- Housing Act (c. 51)
- Local Government Planning and Land Act (c. 65)*

1981
- Disabled Persons Act (c. 43)
- Education Act (c. 60)
- Local Government and Planning (Amendment) Act (c. 41)
- Town and Country Planning (Minerals) Act (c. 36)
- Wildlife and Countryside Act (c. 69)
- Zoo Licensing Act (c. 37)

1982

Liverpool City Council

Mr. Waeing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to be able to reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby's letter of 9 December 1986 in respect of marginal savings accruing to Her Majesty's Government as a result of the withholding of certain payments to Liverpool city council during 1985.

Dr. Boyson: I am replying to the hon. Member today

Welsh Office (Parking)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for th Environment how many fines or fixed penalty payment were incurred by official vehicles for unauthorised parkin outside or near to the Welsh Office during each year of it existence.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have been asked to reply.

Twenty-two in 1986 and 34 in 1985; information fo previous years could be provided only at disproprotionat cost.

Broadleaved Woodlands (Conservation)

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for th Environment if he will make a statement on arrangement to ensure the conservation of broadleaved woodlands an on felling licence regulations.

Mr. John MacKay: I have been asked to reply.

The Government set out a comprehensive policy for th conservation and enhancement of broadleaved woodland in a statement by my right hon. Friend, the Member fo Ayr (Mr. Younger), on 24 July 1985 at columns 557-562

In line with the statement, felling controls were tightened in December 1985 to reduce the volume o timber which may be felled witthout a licence. The Forestry Act 1986 also empowered the Forestry Commission to require restocking following illegal felling

ENERGY

Concessionary Fuel Schemes

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on concessionary fuel schemes.

Mr. David Hunt: The provision of concessionary fuel is a matter for British Coal and is governed by agreements with the unions.

Nuclear Accidents

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Energy if Her Majesty's Government have signed the International Atomic Energy Agency's convention on early notification of a nuclear accident adopted on 26 September 1986; when Her Majesty's Government expect to ratify it; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The conventions adopted by the IAEA on 26 September 1986 on early notification of, and mutual assistance in the event of, nuclear accidents and radiological emergencies were both signed by the UK on that day. Both Conventions will be ratified as soon as possible. In his speech to the special session of the IAEA's general conference my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy made clear that Her Majesty's Government would apply both conventions in advance of formal ratification.

EMPLOYMENT

Entry and Search Powers

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Paymaster General how many officials for whom he has responsibility currently have the power to enter and search premises, subject to statutory conditions; and, in each case, if he will indicate the statutory authority under which power is exercised.

Mr. Trippier: There are 2,233 officials for whom I have responsibility who have the power to enter premises under the following legislative provisions:

Health and Safety at Work &c. Act 1974
Docks and Harbours Act 1966
Gas Safety (Rights of Entry) Regulations 1983
Wages Act 1986
Social Security Act 1975
Employment Agencies Act 1973 (as amended by the Employment Protection Act 1975)

Their powers include inspection, examination and investigation but not specifically powers of search.

Community Programme

Mr. Leighton asked the Paymaster General how much was spent last year on community programme linked training; how much will be spent in the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: In 1985-86 it is provisionally estimated that £3·5 million was spent on community programme linked training. The figure planned for 1986-87 is £5·2 million.

Mr. Leighton asked the Paymaster General how many places there are at present on national initiatives on the community programme.

Mr. Lee: At the latest count, in November 1986, there were 26,100 filled places on national initiatives.

Mr. Leighton asked the Paymaster General what proportion of community programme participants are subject to an EC4 form.

Mr. Lee: The EC4 form referred to by the hon. Member is a record of termination of employment by participants on the community programme. Its purpose is to provide information on the success of community programme workers in going on to other employment and training opportunities.

However, since completion of the form is voluntary the information provided is incomplete and I am unable to answer the question in the form requested. In order to improve this source of information, however, the form has been revised and from 2 February 1987 there will be a requirement for project sponsors to complete it.

Mr. Leighton asked the Paymaster General how many schemes for tender currently exist on the community programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Schemes for tender arrangements were introduced in 1982 in order to encourage the building industry to participate in the community programme, and its predecessor the community enterprise programme, by allowing private building contractors to tender for, and sponsor, building projects.

Although a small number of projects are known to have operated under these arrangements, no central record is kept and it is not possible to state with any certainty how many such projects are currently running. However, the arrangements have not been widely used and as a result discussions have been taking place with the building employers about how they might be improved. Currently the Manpower Services Commission is awaiting detailed proposals from the building employers in this regard.

Engineering Industry

Mr. Leighton asked the Paymaster General what was the number of people employed in the engineering industry in 1979 and 1983, and at the latest available date.

Mr. Lee: The information is in the following table. The latest available data is for November 1986, and the figures for June 1986 are given because comparison between the figures for June and November could be affected by seasonal factors.

Employees in employment in the engineering industry, in Great Britain

	Mechanical engineering (32)[1]	Electrical and electronic engineering (34)[1]	Instrument engineering (37)[1]
June 1979	1,033	752	129
June 1983	768	605	102
June 1986	724	565	105
November 1986	716	561	102

Centres for the Unemployed

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General if the Manpower Services Commission will continue to develop joint sponsorship of centres for the unemployed with local authorities.

Mr. Lee: The Manpower Services Commission currently provides funds through the community programme to provide employment opportunities for long-term unemployed people at 83 centres for the unemployed, all of which are sponsored by local authorities. There are no plans to develop further such projects within the community programme.

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General how his Department assesses the success of trade union centres for the unemployed receiving Manpower Services Commission support.

Mr. Lee: All community programme projects are monitored to ensure that they meet the objectives of the programme, are managed effectively, and provide worthwhile employment opportunities for long-term unemployed people.

Employment Statistics

Mr. Flannery asked the Paymaster General what is the net loss in manufacturing jobs in the south Yorkshire region since 1979.

Mr. Lee: The precise information requested is not available. The Department's statistics for the county monitor only net changes in employment between census dates.

The available figures are from the September 1981 and the preceding June 1978 census of employment. In that period there was a net change of minus 47,500 employees in manufacturing industries, as defined according to the Standard Industrial Classification 1968, in the county of South Yorkshire. The September 1984 census estimates for counties are not yet available. Between censuses, employment statistics are based on small-scale sample inquiries which cannot produce reliable results for areas smaller than the standard economic regions.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General what is the decline in numbers and as a percentage between 1979 and June 1986 in (a) construction employment and (b) construction and manufacturing employment in (i) Great Britain and (ii) the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lee: The information is as follows:

Employees in employment: net changes between June 1979 and June 1986

	Great Britain		United Kingdom
	Numbers	Percentage	Numbers	Percentage
Construction industry (5)[1]	−235,000	−19·6	−252,000	−20·4
Construction and manufacturing industries (2-5)[1]	−2,194,000	−26·4	−2,259,000	−26·6

Employment Measures

Dr. McDonald asked the Paymaster General if he will publish in the Official Report the percentage of those long-term unemployed leaving the employment register after being contacted through the restart scheme who have been (a) added to the sickness register or (b) added to the disablement register; and if he will further break down the latter figure, according to sex and age groups (i) under 24 years, (ii) 25 years to 44 years, (iii) 45 years to 59 years and (iv) over 60 years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Dr. McDonald asked the Paymaster General (1) if he will publish in the Official Report for each job club (a) its location, (b) the length of time it has been operational, (c) the number of males and females who have been members, (d) the percentage success rate in each case and (e) the average number of weeks as a member (i) for those unemployed finding employment through the job club system and (ii) for those unemployed leaving the job club scheme not having found employment;

(2) if he will number and identify (a) those groups who have been successful in finding employment through the job club system, and (b) those groups who have left the job club system not having found employment, in terms of standard age groups, sex, and standard duration of prior unemployment groups;

(3) if he will publish in the Official Report in respect of (a) the community programme, (b) the enterprise allowance scheme, (c) the restart scheme, (d) the job club system, and (e) the job start scheme (i) the statistical survey title, (ii) the survey date, (iii) the publication date; and if for each item he will show the distinction between surveys of the pilot, participant or follow-up types.

Mr. Lee: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Knox asked the Paymaster General how much the Manpower Services Commission spends on employment measures per head of the labour force in (a) each English region, (b) Scotland and (c) Wales.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The figures for approximate total estimated expenditure in 1986-87 on all Manpower Services Commission programmes, including employment and training measures, are given in the table below. Manpower Services Commission salaries, capital expenditure, central services and some other costs which cannot be apportioned by region are excluded.

Approximate spend per head of the labour force[1]

Manpower Services Commission Region	£
South East	59
London	66
South West	121
Midlands	116
Yorkshire and Humberside	129
North West	131
Northern	179
Wales	161
Scotland	143
Great Britain	107

[1] The labour force includes the employed and self-employed, and the unemployed who are available for work.

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Paymaster General how many people in Avon have left the employment register through the restart programme since it started.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 19 January 1987]: We have no means of knowing what proportion of the 2,706 long-term unemployed people who have left the unemployment count in Avon since the beginning of the Restart scheme did so as a direct result of the scheme. Long-term unemployed people leave unemployment for a variety of reasons, including finding work, or training with or without the assistance offered at Restart interviews, Restart training courses and at job clubs.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General what was the total cost per head for breakfasts provided for business bodies and opinion formers at the Action for Jobs launches.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 19 January 1987]: Costs vary from place to place, but the average total cost per head of the breakfast is £4·90.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General (1) out of whose budget the cost of the breakfast launches for Action for Jobs for opinion formers and business bodies comes;

(2) what has been the breakdown of costs for the breakfast launch of Action for Jobs on a region by region basis;

(3) what has been the total cost to the Government of the breakfast presentations to business leaders and opinion formers in relation to the Action for Jobs projects.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 19 January 1987]: The total cost of the breakfast presentations held in 1986 was £164,141·56. This figure represents 0·0055 per cent. of the total £2·956 billion expenditure by the Department of Employment and Manpower Services Commission this year on employment, enterprise and training measures. I believe that this expenditure is necessary to increase knowledge of the programmes that we now have on offer among those who are intended to benefit from them and who can help others to benefit from them. The table allocates the costs by Department of Employment regions:

Region	Cost £
Midlands	25,783·75
South West	36,365·70
Yorkshire and Humberside	3,794·28
North West	57,429·62
South East	37,151·91
Scotland	3,616·30

Action for Jobs expenditure is included in the Department of Employment's budget Vote 3.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General (1) how many opinion formers and business leaders have been invited to the breakfast launches of the Action for Jobs programme (a) nationally and (b) by region;

(2) which cities and towns have been used for the launch of breakfast presentations by the Action for Jobs project.
